THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Poetry.

King of Kings!

Hear ye not those ringing blows,
Sounding, sharp?
Sweeter melody than flows
From the harp!
Sweeter to the toiling mass,
Than sweet air
Ringing out from bells of brass,
Anywhere!

Hist, ye labor-crushers, hist,
As ye go!
Hist, ye fell monopolist,
Labor's foe!
List ye, as the blows ring out
On the air!
List ye to the swelling shout—
Ha, ye scare!

Know ye what these sounds portend?
Well ye do!
That your reign is near the end,
Sordid crew!
That your arrogant cabal
Lords no more!
Tyranny of capital
Now is o'er!

Labor strikes her galling chains—
Hear them crack!
Despots, with your stolen gains,
Get you back!
Capital, erst king in "rings,"
Get thee down!
Labor will, as king of kings,
Wear the crown!

—St Stokum in John Swinton's Paper.

A Vision.

I dreamed a dream. After long hours of pain
And parting I had died, and lived again;
And, floating, somewhere far beyond the skies,
Had found the guarded gates of paradise,
Where, to the angel of the flaming sword,
I showed my pass signed "Servant of the Lord."

"Enter!" the angel cried, "and hav no fear; Friends of your friend are always welcome here."
I bowed; the doors flew wide; I heard the singing,
And saw the blest through golden ether winging
As thick as, when an earthly sunbeam floats
Across a room, within it dance the motes.

There was the Banker who, from fraud-got store,
Had left a deodand to endow the poor;
The grim Inquisitor whose pious zeal
Showed heretics the flames he'd hav them feel;
The gallows-houselled Felon's scare-won wrath,
—For what are hope and charity to faith?
Yet, of all those who taught mankind to rise
Above this sordid world of woes and lies,
Of those by whom man's progress was begun
In love and wisdom, I beheld—not one.

My spirit sank. "Ah, sir!" in grief I cried,
"Hav you no souls of nobler sort inside?
I dare not seek to liv with such as these;
Where are Aurelius, Zeno, Socrates?
Spinoza, Galileo, Darwin, where?"
The angel answered, pointing downward, "There!"
I turned, and fluttered that way in affright
And reached, at length, a scene of softer light,
Where those I sought, and more, with sober mien,
Were gathered talking, activ, but serene.
Voltaire advanced; and, pointing to the door,
Said, "Welcome, friend, to sheol—hell no more.
These souls you see, the friends of all their kind,
To make the worst of evil had no mind.

"And, truth to tell, had doubted from the first
If there could be a region so accursed.
Yet finding that, in fact, some things went ill,
Put forth their practiced energy and skill,
Improved the climate, drained the lake of fire,
Talked to the fallen angels, trained the choir,
Put down bad language, stopped theology,
And made the agreeable limbo that you see."

Professor Proctor on Shipboard.

Theodore Stanton in the Index.

I hav been trying to run over to the United States for the summer. We started on the America, but the engins broke down, and, although some five hundred miles from Liverpool, we had to turn back. We then embarked on the Germanic, and as we are now off the New England coast, we shall probably succeed in landing this time.

Among our passeugers are Professor Richard A. Proctor, the well-known astronomer, and his American wife, who is, by the way, a niece of Jefferson Davis. They are both Freethinkers. He began life a strict Roman Catholic. The religious observances of these English steamship lines hav vexed him not a little, as they hav many of his other fellow-voyagers. For instance, on the first Sunday on the America, Professor Proctor called for the chess board, when he was informed by the steward that it was contrary to the rules of the National Line to allow the passengers to play games of any kind in the saloon on the Sabbath. An hour later a pious young man came up to the ruffled astronomer, and requested him to attend the service which a busy clergyman—there is always at least one minister's name in every cabin list—was about to conduct. It is needless to say that Professor Proctor and his wife, and a goodly number of other passengers, preferred the sunshine and fresh air of the deck to the twaddle of a third-rate preacher in the stuffy cabin. "What a delightful day that will be," the professor said to me, his mind evidently dwelling on the above-mentioned intrusiv pious young man, "when participation in church rites will be considered a weakness that one will wish to hide!"

Our Sunday on the Germanic—we fortunately had to pass but one—did not differ materially from that on the America. Here another clergyman was on hand ready to take command of the faithful. The "tomble," as they say at the minstrels, began Saturday evening. Immediately after dinner the clergyman and some young people took possession of the piano and began to rehearse psalms for the next morning's service. And such singing and playing! Cards and conversation had to be almost abandoned that evening on account of these pious, tuneless characters, who never seemed to imagin that they were making nuisances of themselvs.

Sunday morning the ship's bells were rung as on land, and the faithful gathered below, while the rest of us, who, as Harriet Martineau says, had pushed from our shoulders the burthen of taking care of our own souls, fled to the deck or to our staterooms. It was an encouraging sign to see so many passengers decline to participate in these so-called religious services. I am told that when the English Church is disestablished these Sunday ceremonies will not be obligatory, as is now the case on all Royal Mail steamers, and I am sure that many of the passengers who are now in the habit of participating in them will not be sorry for the change. I hav crossed the ocean several times on the French line, and I hav never heard anybody express regret at the absence of church services on Sunday.

At the same hour that the Protestant clergyman was conducting services in the saloon, two priests were doing the same thing in the steerage. The ship's doctor called our attention to the fact that while the first cabin passengers were about evenly divided between participants and non-participants, the emigrants were, almost to a man, woman, and child, clustered about the Catholic fathers. This proves that while the ignorant masses may still be under stricter priestly rule, the more intelligent upper classes are rapidly breaking away from church control. This sign of the times is strikingly shown at sea on every steamer that plies between the Old and the New World.

One more remark in connection with this subject. While these rules of these English lines prohibit chess, dominoes, and card games on Sunday in the public saloon, they are silent in regard to the gambling that is going on in the smoking-room, and even permit notices to be pasted up, inviting passengers to buy tickets in the pools formed concerning the number of miles that the steamer will run during the next twenty-four hours. In fact, more than one person who would enjoy an innocent game of whist in the saloon on Sunday is driven into the smoking-room, and into betting in order to kill that weary time which hangs so heavily upon you on shipboard. Nor is this high-sea gambling a trivial matter. The London dailies frequently take the matter up and publish volumes of letters against the abuse. I don't know whether anybody has pointed out, what is a fact, that these absurd rules, tabooing such a dignified game as chess during, we may say, an eighth of the voyage, do not tend to decrease the evil complained of.

I hav been reading, during the past ten days, John Evelyn's famous Diary, which presents such an interesting picture of Europe two hundred years ago. The only distasteful feature of the book is the excessiv piety of the author. It is of a piece with the rules of these transatlantic liners. Here is an amusing example of this weakness and blemish. Referring to the death of his promising little son, the father writes, "Thou gavest him to us, thou hast taken him from us; blessed be the name of the Lord!" Then, four lines further on, he continues, "In my opinion, he was suffocated by the women and maids that tended him, and covered him too hot with blankets, as he lay in a cradle, near an excessiv hot fire in a close room." Thus the Lord had nothing to do with it; the boy died simply through the ignorance of the laws of life on the part of his attendants.

Professor Proctor lectured on "Other Worlds" an evening or two before we landed. It was suggested that a certain clergyman preside. Mrs. Proctor mildly objected, and proposed the name of a well-known New York publisher. But it was finally decided that the clergyman whom Professor Proctor had not cared to listen to on the previous Sunday should introduce him "Well," said a Freethinking lady passenger, "this looks as if the divine intends to capture the savant. His introductory remarks may be of such a nature that you, Professor, will find yourself in the arms of the church before you open your mouth." So the purser was called, and a request was made that the proposed chairman be asked not to touch on religious questions, which he agreed not to do. "What a terror these itinerant ministers are," exclaimed another member of our group; "they are the spiritual and intellectual pirates of the high seas! Like birds of prey, they are ever ready to swoop down and carry up to the throne whatever they can lay hands upon." But our particular clergyman would hav had hard work in appropriating to the church, even if he had been inclined to do so, the lecture of Professor Proctor. It was a clear and eloquent proof of the immutability of natural laws, from the beginning of all time; and it showed the absurdity, I had almost said blasphemy, of making out this poor little world of ours the particular care of the great creator of the thousands upon thousands of mightier suns and planets that are shining in infinit space. How anybody could hav left the Germanic saloon, when Professor Proctor sat down, without being struck by the puerility of the Christian theology, passes my comprehension. If Professor Proctor could deliver his lecture on every transatlantic steamer, I don't think I would complain of the Sunday services.

From the Progressiv Age.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of New York is doing noble work for the cause of Liberalism in the publication of cartoons weekly illustrating the Bible doctrins and teachings and other kindred questions. The last issue (July 3d) contained a half-page cartoon showing the effects of the exemption from taxation of church property. The artist has done himself as well as the Truth Seeker Company great credit. But a glance is equivalent to volumes of written arguments for church taxation.

At the extreme left is a modest-appearing New England farm-house. Posted against the yard fence is the following: "Sheriff's sale for taxes." Under the club of the crier, who stands in a wagon with the clerk of the sale with pen and paper, stands a horse that is being sold. Round about is a congregation of people—evidently good Christians who belong to the church at the extreme right—who are in attendance upon the sale and bidding; just back of them is the old slab barn; lying near by are the wheelbarrow, the scythe, the rake, and the hoe, the purchase of a bidder. On the stoop with feet resting on the ground sits the wife, with her face covered with her apron and wiping the tears. In the field in front stands the plow with a partly turned furrow, from which the team has been unhitched, leaving only the double and whiffle trees attached. It has been taken to the crier's stand for sale. With pants in his boots, sleeves rolled above the elbows exposing the brawny, muscular arms, and between the handles of the plow, leaning back against the round, the hard-working, honest son of toil, the farmer, stands. His eyes are cast down to the ground as he stands there; his thoughts may be read in his face as he stands there. He murmurs not; he is apparently overcome with the situation. His team is gone; his wife and family must hav bread.

To the right and in the rear stands a magnificent structure with a towering steeple piercing the clouds. At the extreme right is seen the palatial parsonage with a stone front, and furnished throughout with the best the market affords. Leaning against the stoop railing in front stands the parson in his broadcloth cut-away exposing a well-rounded, well-kept abdomen. His low-cut shoes, exposing socks of the latest stripe; his white waistcoat, adorned with a gold watch chain; his dude eye-glasses and his hair and side whiskers cut à la mode, together with a made-up, contemptuous face, all vividly characterize his impudence and indifference as he stands there and looks across to watch the progress of the sale. About him are stone and gravel walks, luxury, ease, fashion. He seems to say, "Pay up your taxes, you clodhopper, and this calamity will not befall you," and at the same time tantalizes the honest old man with the fact that church property is exempt, for in his hand is this aggravating fact: $746,294,833 untaxed church property in the United States. No wonder the farmer thus stands and cogitates this taxation problem in his mind as he there thinks of his excessiv taxation to made up for that which is not taxed. The designer of the cartoon, Mr. Watson Heston, deserves great credit. Tax church property.

Image Breaker. Six Lectures: Decline of Faith, Protestant Intolerance, Washington an Unbeliver; Jefferson an Unbeliever; Paine and Wesley; Christian Sabbath. Each 5 cents; bound, paper, 25 cents; per doz. 40 cts.

Thomas Paine. The Apostle of Religious and Political Liberty. Tells the story of the Author-Hero's life, delineates the leading traits of his character and genius, and vindicates his name from the aspersions cast upon it. Choice extracts from "Common Sense," "American Crisis," "Rights of Man," and "Age of Reason" are given; also, tributes to Paine's character from more than one hundred noted persons of Europe and America, many of them written expressly for this work. Second edition, 160 pages, printed on fine tinted paper, neatly bound, and containing a handsome steel portrait of Paine. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Apostle of Liberty. An address delivered in Paine Hall, before the N. E. Freethinkers' Convention, January 29, 1884. Price, 10 cents.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

A STUDY
OF

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. He has for twenty years treated exclusivly all diseases of the Sexual Organs, in the cures of which he stands preeminent. SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., are cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. NO STOMACH MEDICIN USED. It is one of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. It is not a catch-penny get up, such as a pad, belt, pastille, nor magnetic appliance, but simply a medicin to be applied externally on the parts affected, which cures by absorption. Send five 2-cent stamps for his "Private Counselor," giving full information. Address Dr. R. P. Fellows, Vineland, N. J. and say where you saw this advertisment.

N. B.—Dr. Fellows begs leave to say that he is an Infidel of the most pronounced character. Bro. Liberals, your patronage is solicited.

"SHOPPEL'S MODERN HOUSES" No. 3.

(Just Published, July 1, 1886) CONTAINS:

A colored frontispiece showing the modern style of painting.

A cardboard supplement, ingeniously drawn and colored, to supply all the neccessary pieces for constructing a model house, with plain directions for putting them together.

While the supplement affords both old and young the greatest amusement, it is more than a toy. It is, in fact, a most practical lesson in Architecture; a perfect, scaled model of one of our most popular designs, so exact that it is useful to builders.

55 New Designs for Residences (cost varying from $500 to $15,000).
2 New Designs for Barns.
1 New Design for a Chapel.
Drawings and description of a model Kitchen (by Maria Parloa) and a perfect Cistern.
An Article on Villa Park Associations.

News of the Week.

CHOLERA is again prevalent in Italy.

A WOMAN has been admitted to a sitting in the French Academy of Science.

THE Central Labor Union has named the first Monday in September as a workingmen's holiday.

FOUR members of Typographical Union No. 47 hav been found "guilty" in their trial for boycotting a newspaper at New Haven.

WILLIAM T. MONTAVERDE owns a park at Maspeth, Long Island. He allowed base ball to be played there on Sunday and has been fined $250.

BEECHER is being received in London with every evidence of hospitality. His religion is a puzzle to the English people, but he is highly spoken of as an orator.

THE trial of the Anarchists at Chicago is proceeding. Very little direct testimony has as yet been furnished connecting the speakers at the Haymarket Square meeting with the thrower of the bomb.

NED BUNTLINE, the scout, soldier, and story writer, died at his home in Stamford, N. Y., last week. His real name was Edward Z. C. Judson. He was 64 years old and wealthy, having made a fortune by his pen.

THE Salvation Army has been occupying an old Baptist church at Bristol, Conn., much to the disgust of the respectable citizens of that place, who used every endeavor to get the Salvationists to go away. Last Saturday somebody burnt up the church.

THE trades unions are boycotting the beer manufactured by George Ehret because Ehret in some way contributed to the conviction of the Theiss boycotters. Other brewers express sympathy with Mr. Ehret, and now the Central Labor Union threatens to boycott all beer.

COLONEL GILDER, who was to hav left New York on an arctic exploring expedition last week, is still where the weather is warm. He was arrested on the eve of his intended departure charged with breach of trust by a young woman with whom he had sustained intricate relations.

HOME RULE for Ireland is lost for the present. About a quarter of a million of American dollars hav gone to Ireland to help make the fight, and while this sort of encouragement continues it is probable that a sufficient number of patriots may be found in that country to keep up the agitation.

GENLRAL BOULANGER, minister of war, and Baron de Lareinty, senator, quarreled in the French Senate one day last week, and on Saturday fought a duel near Paris. The senator fired first and missed. Then the general fired in the air, when both declared their honor vindicated and shook hands.

JULY 13th the papers contained this dispatch from Belfast, Ireland: "Serious rioting broke out this evening between Catholics and Protestants. Many stones were thrown and revolvers were freely used. The military was called out to restore order. Many persons were injured and sent to hospitals."

THERE was until a short time ago, a shoe firm doing business in Brooklyn under the name of Brennan & White. A year ago the firm discharged a number of girls for joining the Knights of Labor. Methods were thereupon adopted by the Knights all over the country to reduce Brennan & White's trade, and a month ago the firm went out of business. Brennan has just accepted a position as employee in another man's factory.

MRS. MARY FENN, better known as Mary Davis, died in Orange, N. J., last Sunday. Mrs. Fenn had been prominently identified with philanthropic and reform movements for thirty years, and was widely known to those engaged in the woman suffrage and the temperance movements. She was one of the early workers in the antislavery movement, and was for many years a well-known lecturer. In 1847 she married Samuel G. Love, a teacher, in Buffalo. In 1855 she obtained a divorce from Love in Indiana, and afterward she married Andrew Jackson Davis, the Spiritualist, and the expounder of Harmonial Philosophy. The couple lived in Orange from 1858 until about two years ago. Mr. Davis then left her, alleging as a reason that he had found a flaw in the Indiana divorce. He began a suit to annul their marriage. She made no effort to contest the suit. She was a member of Sorosis, and from 1860 to 1864 she edited the Herald of Progress.

Gems of Thought.

IN this age of intelligence we ought to be free enough to throw falsehood aside and embrace the truth, no matter what havoc it makes of old superstitions and fables. One of the two systems must be true—supernaturalism or natural law; if one is true the other is certainly false, and must be discarded. Supernaturalism has long held sway and men hav yielded a tacit consent that it is the power which has ruled the world, but science is now telling us, in thunder tones, that there is no supernaturalism, that everything is natural; hence old theology must be set aside, and the truths of unerring science must be taken in its place.—Bennett's Infidel Abroad.

EPITAPH ON A FRIEND.

An honest man here lies at rest
As e'er God with his image blessed:
The friend of man, the friend of truth,
The friend of age, and guide of youth;
Few hearts like his, with virtue warmed,
Few hearts with knowledge so informed;
If there's another world, he livs in bliss,
If there is none, he made the best of this.
—Burns.

BY careful investigation into the origin of the Biblical canon, and by the results of historical criticism, the Bible is shown to be a book of human composition and, with all its many excellences, not a divinely inspired and infallible authority. By a careful comparison of religions, by the clear light of science, and by the zeit-geist [spirit of the age], which does not favor anything miraculous, we are led to disbelieve the legendary stories of the Old Testament, and the miracles and myths of the New. By similiar studies the deified Jesus becomes a pure teacher of exalted moral character, born of Joseph and Mary, around whom, when dead, the magnified stories inseparable from such an age and people gradually clustered, gathering credence by repetition, and strength by transmission from one generation to another. . . . Jesus, being in reality the God of the Christians, givs to them as an object of worship little more than a magnified man, to whom they address petitions for rain, success in business, victory in war, and the like.—Stoddard's New Faith.

WHATSOEVER thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might, for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest.—Ecclesiastes ix, 10.

NATIONS as well as men, if they aim high, must sometimes overstrain themselvs, and weariness must ensue. Nor did the commonwealth of England come to nothing, though in a society not half emancipated from feudalism it was premature, and therefore, at the time, a failure. It opened a glimpse of a new order of things; it was the first example of a great national republic, the republics of antiquity having been at once city-republics and republics of slave-owners; it not only heralded but to some extent prepared the American and even the French Revolution. In its sublime death-song, chanted by the great Puritan poet, we can catch the accents of a hope that did not die.—Goldwin Smith.

BUT what more oft, in nations grown corrupt,
And by their vices brought to servitude,
Than to love bondage more than liberty—
Bondage with ease than strenuous liberty—
And to despise, or envy, or suspect
Whom God hath, of his special favor, raised
As their deliverer? If he aught begin,
How frequent to desert him, and at last
To heap ingratitude on worthiest deeds!—Milton.

IT has been said that the practical objects of all free institutions is to get twelve or fifteen honest men into a jury-box. Intelligence must be added if justice is to be done, especially when there is a long chain of evidence, or when, as in libel cases, fine perceptions are required; but the duty of a juryman in an important cause is as high as any that a citizen can be called upon to perform.—Toronto Bystander.

ALL destruction is but a little dust on the wind. Does not humanity itself abide? What truth that man ever had is lost? Who are those that stand with arms flung around the old creed or name or cherished "body of Christ," trembling lest the universe crack, if that go down? 'Twere a strange universe to be alarmed because things must go down when their time has come!—Samuel Johnson, D.D.

YET not to thy eternal resting-place
Shalt thou retire alone—nor couldst thou wish
Couch more magnificent. Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings,
The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good,
Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past—
All in one mighty sepulcher.
—Bryant's Thanatopsis.

MAN, say some, knows God by immediate intuition; he needs no argument for his existence, because he perceives God directly—face to face—without any medium. It is easy to assert this, but obviously the assertion is the merest dogmatism. Not one man in a thousand, who understands what he is affirming, will dare to claim to hav an immediate vision of God, and nothing can be more likely than that the man who makes such a claim is self-deluded.—Professor Flint.

EARLY associations are generally the strongest in the human mind, and what we hav been taught to credit as children we are seldom disposed to question as men. Called away from speculativ inquiries by the common business of life, men in general possess neither the inclination nor the leisure to examin what they believe or why they believe. A powerful prejudice remains in the mind, insures conviction without the trouble of thinking, and repels doubt without the aid or authority of reason.—Sir William Drummond.

MEN are but children of a larger growth;
Our appetites as apt to change as theirs,
And full as craving too, and full as vain;
And yet the soul, shut up in her dark room,
Viewing so clear abroad, at home sees nothing;
But, like a mole in earth, busy and blind,
Works all her folly up and casts it upward
To the world's open view. —Dryden.

Odds and Ends.

"I HOPE, Johnny," said the Sunday-school teacher to her new scholar, "that your parents are good Christians?" "Well, ma is," replied Johnny, "an' pa used to be, but I guess he is a little out of practice now."

THE JACKASS AND THE EVANGELIST.

A jackass went into a meeting-house and heard an Evangelist preach a sermon on "Total Depravity." When he came forth he made a joyful noise, sung aloud, and thanked his stars that he was made a jackass and not a depraved human being.

Moral: This fable teaches that when self-abasement becomes too abysmal it is liable to overreach itself.

THE FUNNY MAN.

The "funny man" sat in his easy chair,
But the chair wasn't easy to him;
For his eyes were fixed in a vacant glare,
And his face was dark and grim.

"I've written 'em up, an' I've written 'em down—
The Mother-in-law and the Dude,
Chicago girl's boot and the Congressman's loot,
And the Young Wife's slack-baked food.

"My liver is torpid, I'm losing in girth,
My brain's slowly oozing away;
Oh, the ghastliest joke on this whole wide earth
Is this being funny for pay!"

* * * * * * *

He sits to-day in his easy chair
With a smile on his plump, round cheek;
There's an unctuous roll in his voice whene'er
He laughs or he tries to speak.

For he writes the "Death Notices—one line per dime,"
And he pens all the elegies sad;
He revels in "Accidents," "Murders," and "Crimes,"
And "One More Good Man Gone Bad!"

As he writes up the items of "Scalded Child"
His "asides" keep the room in a roar;
For his wit runs riot in fancies wild,
Since he's funny for pay no more.
—Richard Lloyd.

"MA," he said, as he suddenly looked up from his book, "how much do you owe the cook?" "What a question! I believe there are three months' wages due her." "Say, why don't you reorganize the kitchen?" "What do you mean, Robert?" "Why, when pa and the other fellows get hold of a railroad, they reorganize, and everybody gets left. Let's reorganize on Hannah, beat her out of thirty-six dollars, and whack on the boodle."—Wall Street News.

TO THE MAN WHO ASKED: "IS IT WARM?"

Sing hey! for a caldron of boiling oil,
And a basin of molten lead,
Where this obdurate sinner may sizzle and boil
And tropically soak his head.

Who says to his brother in sweltering stew,
With a gurgle of fervid glee,
"Is it torrid enough to-day for you?
It 's not warm enough for me."

May he singe and toast, and simmer and roast,
And char, and kindle, and burn,
And scorch and singe till his soul will cringe,
And his body to cinders turn.

Then the blistering heat of a furnace-fire,
Shall accomplish his just cremation,
And fagots and peat be his funeral-pyre
To finish his incineration.

And thus this fellow we'll ardently kiln,
And listen with joy to his moans;
And when he has carbonized all that he will
We'll each take one of his bones;

And waving the calcined remains of him,
A Parseean dance will do;
And shout this jocular requiem:
"Is it hot enough now for you?"
—Buffalo Express.

No amount of piled-up age can make a good thing bad, or a useless thing useful. This nineteenth century is noisy enough without having to bear the infliction of medieval noises that lost all significance and sense a century ago. In the time of Queen Elizabeth, it was well enough to ring the church-bells to tell the time, to summon church-goers to their devotions, to sound the curfew, and to giv the alarm when fire or violence threatened the townsfolk. But what earthly reason is there to-day, when every man can hav a clock at home, and when almost every man has a watch in his pocket, for the maddening clangor of the church-bells, rending the air day and night, hammering Sunday from a day of rest into a day of nerve-racking uneasiness? There is no end of poetry about the church-bells. Poets beyond count hav taken each his turn at entreating us to listen to their music or their melody or their tender tones. But the poetry has pretty thoroughly gone out of the church-bells. To-day they are—at least in all cities and large towns—simply an unmitigated nuisance. They serve no end whatever. Any man who has a dollar of his own can buy a clock. A house without a clock is about as rare as a house without a roof. People know when it is ten, or half-past ten, or eleven, on Sunday morning, as well as they know when the hours come on the other days of the week. Church-going people do not, the most of them, liv within call of the bells of their own particular churches. And they are on their way to their Sunday services long before the bells begin to ring. We can never get statistics of the absolute misery and suffering caused by the discordant clamor of a great city's hundreds of discordant bells. But we know that the untimely ringing breaks the scant sleep of the weary, tortures the sensitiv nerves of the sick, and annoys the entire populace, without serving any purpose whatever, beyond pleasing those agreeable people who want to hav everything done in this century as it was done in other centuries; and who ought to be relegated to some limbo where they may practice upon each other the barbarism they pretend to admire.—Puck.

A thorough and overwhelming reply to the New York Observer's slanderous attacks upon the Author-Hero of the American Revolution. Containing both the slanders and their refutation.

BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

—o—

The New York Observer (Presbyterian) having recently reissued its assault upon the memory of Paine, this pamphlet should be circulated everywhere in vindication.

60pp. Price 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC CANARD

A Fabricated Account of a Scene at the Death-bed of Thomas Paine.

BY W. H. BURR.

This pamphlet shows that the account of Paine's dying moments attributed to Bishop Fenwick (upon which the Observer relies to prove its principal charges) is a forgery, it being impossible that Fenwick could hav written the alleged account.

18pp. Price 5 cents; 25 for $1.00.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

THE GHOST IN THE METHODIST CHURCHYARD.

"Lo! what an entertaining sight are brethren who agree."—Old Hymn.

Notes and Clippings.

THE pope has placed a red hat on the head of a Canadian gentleman named Taschereau, so that Canada may not be behind the United States in the matter of cardinals.

THE Concord (Mass.) School of Philosophy is holding its annual sessions. At last accounts the esoteric significance of Dante's works was being learnedly discussed.

"THE Immaculate Conception Academy" is the queer name of a Catholic seminary for young ladies at Davenport, Iowa. The production of any modern Marys need not necessarily be looked for.

THE Christian at Work has an article on "How to Select a Boy." If that journal would giv its readers something on "How to Select a Girl" it would come nearer fulfilling the high office of a religious paper.

THERE is something destructiv about religious ice-cream. At a festival held last week by a Baptist church at Eastport, Me., the minister and forty others were seriously poisoned by eating the deadly substance.

THE notion that the world would come to an end on the 15th of last month at two o'clock in the afternoon was believed by an immense multitude of the more ignorant classes in Madrid, Spain. At that time more than a thousand persons assembled on the hights of Vistelles, and tremblingly waited for the catastrophe. "Many curious phenomena were seen in the sky by the excited spectators, as, for instance, St. Peter walking in the midst of a red cloud, but the end did not come." Some person finally stated that a mistake had been made in the calculation, and the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds would occur on the 24th of June, and the crowd dispersed.

PRESIDENT DWIGHT, in a recent speech, said that Yale is a Christian college, and a few minutes later affirmed that it was a progressiv university. This, says the Boston Transcript, is what Hosea Biglow would call heading north of south.

A PRESBYTERIAN editor writes to a Methodist editor: "Usually it is not worth while to reason with a fanatic, because he will giv his fancies all the authority of your facts." Anyone who has ever attempted to reason with either a Methodist or a Presbyterian will be able to appreciate the truth of that remark.

MRS. DOWNS, the wife of Parson Downs, of Boston, says that the latest charge against her husband, supported by a child four months old, and the affidavits of the child's mother and other persons, is part of a conspiracy to ruin him. The rest of the conspiracy is supposed to be the Rev. Mr. Downs's ministerial relations with the woman who is prosecuting him.

THE fecundity of the religious liar is something remarkable. This is the latest: "BRADFORD JUNCTION, W. VA., July 24th—Simon Wilcox, a farmer here, was formerly an enthusiastic church-member, but on Thursday last, when he surveyed the ruin of his crops wrought by a hail storm, he began to curse his maker for allowing such destruction. In the midst of his curses he was suddenly stricken with paralysis, and could not leave the spot. There his neighbors found him, and they say they could not release him, as he was surrounded by a circle of intense heat. When they tried to push him out of it with a pole the pole burnt off, and it was not until toward evening that the mysterious heat disappeared. Then the unfortunate man fell down unconscious, and was picked up a raving maniac." In the presence of such monumental lies as this, the ordinary yarns about faith-cures pass as harmless fibs.

THE St. Louis, Mich., Herald has a plain way of speaking. Here is an item from that paper: "A Candidate for Hell.—The greatest indignation prevails among our citizens who hav become acquainted with the facts over the late barbarous acts of the Methodist minister, Rev. Geo. Donaldson, in pounding and otherwise maltreating his children. Last Wednesday, for some cause, either fancied or real, he pounded his twelve-year-old son till the boy's mother was forced to call in neighbors, fearing that the boy would be killed. This Rev. scab seems to be a brute of the first water, and if the church does its duty it will hop onto him with both feet. But the chances are that they will still go and hear him preach, and if they do, we mark it down right here that in the Herald's opinion they are the same sort of hypocritical lice that he is."

THERE has been a revival of religion in Marion, Ind. Following is the St. Louis Republican's account of one evening's devotions: "Sunday night witnessed the wildest and most extravagant scenes yet enacted. Such shouting, such jumping, such hallelujahs, such delightful, promiscuous, and abandoned hugging of brothers and sisters in the Lord presented a scene the like of which has never before been witnessed in this country. It was a wild, unrestrained saturnalia of unbridled passion and emotion. The converts who were stricken down by the hand of God prior to their conversion relate wonderful tales of being suspended by a hair over the pit of hell, of being fanned by the sulphurous breezes from the infernal regions, of looking into boiling caldrons, of being nibbled at by the fiery serpents and grinning devils, of being saved by the outstretched hand of a pitying providence."

THE following sentiments were elicited from Colonel Ingersoll in an interview in current circulation: "The only benefit of the Knights of Labor to the workingmen arises from the discussions that take place. But in this country such organizations cannot do great good. The laboring men should redress all their grievances by the ballot. The poorest man can vote just as often as the rich man, and his vote counts just as much. As long as the laboring man follows the drum and fife of a political party, just so long he will hav grievances. Let labor organize, not to boycott, not to strike, but to vote. His ballot is the weapon to be used. The workingman will find that without revenge and without riot the world can be made better, and the capitalist will find that starvation prices for his laborers will finally starve him. He will find that property gets its value from the colonization of the people, from general prosperity; that he cannot injure others without injuring himself. I believe that in a few years public opinion will become so enlightened and humane that only those who giv good wages for reasonable hours will be considered as honest men. My sympathies are with the workers. The millionaires can take care of themselvs."

Queensland.

The great colony of Queenland, Australia, is comparativly new. The sands of Moreton Bay first bore the footprints of the pioneer navigator who landed upon its shores over sixty years ago, and gave the name of Brisbane to the magnificent river which empties into the bay.

In 1825 a penal settlement was founded at the mouth of the river, and convict gloom hung over these fair shores, tainting the atmosphere and retarding settlement until 1839, when the last batch of convicts were landed here. Ten years later the first free emigrants arrived, and settled in what was then the bush, but now a crowded suburb of Brisbane, twelve miles from the bay, and to which they gave the name of the good ship which had brought them across the waste of trackless waters. In their pursuit of a new home in this land of promis, Fortitude Valley was the chosen name and link that bound them to the far-off past. It was not until 1859 that the colony of Queensland was proclaimed by imperial command, and its first governor was Sir George Fergurson Bowen. From this point may be dated its true progress. Queensland has an area of 678,600 square miles, with an extent of seaboard of about 2,500 miles, and thrift, energy, and wealth are evidenced upon every hand. The coast swarms with vessels, from the majestic mail steamers from the Old World to the humble fishing-boat, while inland railways hurry rich freight to interior cities. Far away in the silent bush towns hav arisen, the country is parceled out and fenced off; the boom of the miner's blast, the crush of the quartz-crushing mill, the shrill whirl of the saw, the bleating of millions of sheep, the lowing of hundreds of thousands of cattle, the crack of the teamster's whip, hav awakened the echoes, and this great continent that has lain for ages in these southern waters the home of the bushman, the kangaroo, and the emu, is silent no longer, but has awakened to life and activity, and started in the race of progression.

The colony appears to be divided into three grand divisions, each eminently adapted to its own peculiar industry. Parallel with the eastern coast runs a high range of mountains, distant from twenty to one hundred miles from the sea—a continuation of the Blue mountains of New South Wales and the great Australian Alps. Between this range and the ocean we find a wide belt of alluvial soil, through which meander many fine rivers and their tributary streams. Beyond the coast range is a vast table-land, with its level or gently undulating plains stretching away like the vast prairies of America to the distant sunset. These three well-defined divisions are each devoted to different industries. The alluvial coast lands are devoted to timber-getting and agriculture. Before the woodsman with his ax appeared upon the scene, the river banks were clothed with a heavy growth of timber, among which the stately Moreton Bay pine, the red cedar, and the imperishable beech grew to enormous size. The expiring sigh of the last tree as it fell was the signal for the farmer to step in with ax and brand. The jungle was quickly cleared, and in its place appeared maize, cotton, tobacco, and sugar, adding another charm to the already beautified rivers. Across the range, which towers to a hight of over three thousand feet, a different sight meets the eye. The basaltic plains of the table-lands are covered with a luxuriant growth of nutritious grasses, and dotted with flocks and herds. In 1858 gold was discovered in the Coast Range. At this magic word the third great division resounded with the hum of busy men. Queensland, says a recent chronicler, has thus built up three great industries, and the census of 1883 showed a population of 287,475 persons. The census has recently been taken; the results not yet reported.

Brisbane, the capital of Queensland, is a pretty town, situated upon both banks of the Brisbane river, like San Francisco, beautified with hills and valleys, and contains about sixty thousand inhabitants, and, for its age, promises to be no mean rival of Sydney or Melbourne, as it can well be, as it is five hundred miles from the former and one thousand and sixty miles from the latter city. Its schools are numerous and well conducted. In an act passed by Parliament in 1875, three cardinal principles were incorporated into its school provisions, namely, that education in the colony should be free, secular, and compulsory; and of these provisions the first and second are well maintained. In outside districts the population is too limited and widely scattered to enforce the last provision. A shrewd observer has said that in a Queensland state school a teacher may impress upon a boy that a lie is wrong because it may injure another, or because it is a violation of the laws of veracity, which should ever be observed, because by so doing the welfare of the community is maintained; but the teacher must not enforce truthfulness because lying is an offense against God. The school laws require that secular teaching must be given five hours in a day, except for infant classes; after that any minister or religious person of good standing may visit the school and impart religious instruction to those who are willing to stay and listen to it. But none is compelled to remain. At the end of 1884 there were 263 state schools open and in operation in Queensland, with a staff of 1,152 teachers (554 males, 598 females), with an enrolment of 52,556 scholars, besides numbers of private and denominational schools, of which the Catholics hav a large percentage—but they receive no state support.

Queensland is immensely rich in minerals, and but a small portion of its wealth has as yet been discovered. It would seem that the only thing lacking here is water. Whisky is plenty, and those who are engaged in its traffic are on the road to wealth, as far as pounds and shillings are concerned. I see by home papers which we receive that a move is on foot by some parties to make Saturday afternoon a half-holiday, as it is in the colonies. While I am in favor of every progressiv move, or a step in advance, I do not see from its workings here that it would be any benefit to the masses. Here all laborers quit work Saturday noon, and receive their week's wages, and a large per cent of them make straight for the "pub," as it is called. There are no gilded saloons here, as in America, but to sell liquor a publican must hav a house built on a certain pattern regulated by law. He must hav accommodations for a certain number of boarders and lodgers. He can then become a licensed victualer; that includes liquor-selling to an unlimited extent up to eleven o'clock at night six nights in a week, but on Sunday to get a drink—even a glass of beer—a man must be a traveler, and be seven miles from where he slept. On Saturday, I heard a publican say, it was nothing unusual to take from £60 to £70 over his bar, hence it looks to me as if it would be much better for those men and their families if they did their usual day's work on Saturday, and would be better still if they received their wages on Monday. Then their wives would be better able to provide for the family wants. But holidays seem to be the rule here—a week at Christmas, four days at Easter, besides state and religious holidays without number, and some parties are trying to get a two days' holiday for the queen's birthday, and to celebrate the fiftieth year of her reign. But republicanism is taking deep root with the people. No sentiment receives more earnest applause than republican principles enunciated from the platform, and Freethought is growing. The seed which Mr. Tyerman, Professor Denton, and others hav sown in the past is now yielding a rich harvest.

Mr. York has given two courses of lectures here in Brisbane to large and increasing audiences, and is to giv the third course, besides holding a debate of six nights with a Mr. H. A. Long—a new importation from Scotland, who styles himself the King of the Glasgow Green. He announces that his especial mission here is to put up the flood-gates and stop the great wave of Infidelity that is sweeping over the colonies. He had written to his son-in-law in Brisbane to get up a debate for him, so he challenged Mr. York, in Mr. Long's name, before his arrival. On the arrival of Mr. Long from Glasgow, the Christians received him with open arms. The Young Men's Christian Association made an especially warm place for him under their wings; the churches gave him a big tea-meeting, and the ministers made speeches of welcome, and felt that it was providential that our brother had arrived just at this time to stay the great evil that was now in their midst (Freethought revival). Brother Long calmed their fears by promising to soon pump the Infidel dry, for nothing could withstand the truth as it is in Jesus. The topics for debate are:

1. Christian Theism vs. Atheism.
2. Evolution vs. Mosaic Creation.
3. Plenary Inspiration of the Bible.
4. Origin of Christianity.
5. Secularism as a Civilizer vs. Christianity.

The coming debate is exciting much interest. Over one hundred gentlemen hav sent in their names as a committee for Mr. York, to offset the churches and Young Men's Christian Association behind Mr. Long.

The Rev. Mr. McCulloch, Presbyterian (Mr. Long is Calvanistic Presbyterian), in introducing Mr. Long to his congregation said that our brother was going down—he had liked to hav said amongst the disreputable, but would say—amongst the roughs, and hoped they would pray for him. So you see Presbyterianism is no better here than in our part of the world.

Mr. Long has written a book: "Calvanism Popularized and Carbonized." The debate is to come off the 8th, 9th, 10th, 15th, 16th, and 17th of June.

The weather here is charming. They call it winter. The nights are cool, sometimes a slight frost; the days bright and warm. This is the antipodes. The rains here are in the summer, leaving the winters dry and pleasant. The coldest months are May, June, and July; the warmest December, January, and February, when it is said to be decidedly hot. Mr. York's work will hold us here until the last of June, after which we expect to visit the principal towns of Queensland, going north as far as Townsville and Charters Towers, and get back to Sydney before the hot weather, when our present intention is to sail for home, which we hope to see by Christmas.

Good wishes for the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which reaches us every month. MRS. J. L. YORK.

Authorship of the Declaration of Independence.

In the year 1880 Prof. V. B. Denslow, then literary editor of the Chicago Times, published a book entitled, "Modern Thinkers," in which he says:

> As to the round, undisguised hand in which the original draft of the Declaration of Independence is written, it is not claimed to be Jefferson's, and it seems to be very clearly that of Thomas Paine, who, as the most masterly rhetorician of the period, would naturally be called to write it.

In an introduction to this book written by Colonel Ingersoll, he remarks:

> It is now claimed that the original document is in Paine's handwriting. It certainly is not in Jefferson's.

This is all I ever heard about any claim that the original draft of the Declaration is in Paine's handwriting. But Professor Denslow was misled by a fac simile of an engrossed copy, and either he or Colonel Ingersoll soon afterward acknowledged the error.

The earliest hint of Paine's authorship of the Declaration, so far as I hav been able to discover, was in the Newark Gazette, October 5, 1802. I quote the paragraph with the editor's own italics and capitals:

> It has loug been supposed that Mr. Jefferson drew up the Declaration of Independence. This report was raised to further his election, and the philosopher has thought fit to countenance it. It was thought absolutely necessary to prove that he had done at least one good act in his life, and this was pitched upon. Mr. Jefferson was one of a committee of five, indeed, and after they had jointly drawn up the instrument it was given by Congress to a certain person, who, above all others, the Democrats would dislike to hear had corrected the writings of Mr. Jefferson for revision and amendment, and it was from this person it received the ELEGANT DRESS it now appears in.

The statement that it was "jointly drawn up" by the committee we now know is not true. It is also untrue that "it was given by Congress to a certain person for revision and amendment." But after the instrument was adopted it was ordered by Congress to be engrossed, and that engrossment, for aught I know, may hav been done by Thomas Paine, who was a good penman.

Twenty-five days after the appearance of the above paragraph in the Newark Gazette, Thomas Paine landed in Baltimore from a national ship, having been brought over from France in the same by order of President Jefferson.

Some time before this, probably when Jefferson ran as a candidate for the presidency in 1800, the Virginia Gazette threw out an intimation that the Declaration was drafted "by some anonymous person."

Now, Paine was anonymous all through the American Revolution, and even until four years after his return to England. Hardly had he landed there in 1787 before he issued an anonymous pamphlet entitled, "Prospects on the War." Four years later he came out openly as the author of the "Rights of Man." Then some critic, by comparison of the style, detected him as the author of the former pamphlet, and it was reissued in his name.

This little pamphlet is remarkable as containing Paine's only allusion to Junius, which, however, was intended to be anonymous. But a further discovery in 1880, first by Librarian Spofford and then by me, that Paine was "Casca," an anonymous contributor to the "Weekly Crisis" of 1755-6, published in London, discloses one more allusion to Junius by Paine:

> Should galling Junius make a new attack
> (Whose lashes still are flagrant on your back),
> The libeler by some state bloodhound trace,
> And make him feel the terrors of your place.

This was addressed to Lord Mansfield. And, by the way, in the same epistle is the couplet:

> These lines, inspired by Churchill's laureled shade,
> I write, unknown, unpatronized, unpaid.

How strikingly this parallels with Junius's private letter to Lord Chatham, January 14, 1772: "Retired and unknown, I liv in the shade, and hav only a speculativ ambition." And, again, see how it parallels with both Junius and Paine, neither of whom would receive even the smallest portion of the profits of his literary works. Junius, "Casca," and Paine all wrote "unknown, unpatronized, unpaid." Another such a parallel cannot be found in all time.

Franklin was probably the only person who knew—or suspected, if you please—that Paine was Junius. So, when the task devolved on Jefferson to draw the Declaration of Independence, Franklin could at once hand in to Jefferson a draft prepared by Paine, which was substantially an epitome of "Common Sense." In copying that draft, Jefferson was at liberty to make verbal changes, which he doubtless did. Only two or three slight amendments were made by Adams and Franklin. But Congress mutilated the document shockingly. Some of its most eloquent passages were stricken out, particularly the entire paragraph relating to slavery and the slave trade. The pen of Jefferson was never equal to such flights, and Colonel Ingersoll has well said:

Certain it is that Jefferson could not hav written anything so manly, so striking, so comprehensiv, so clear, so convincing, and so faultless in rhetoric and rhythm.

And Professor Denslow, after making a very able argument in favor of Paine's authorship of the document, concludes thus:

Enough! The Declaration of Independence must hereafter be construed as a fabric whose warp and woof were Thomas Paine's.

Now, if Paine was the substantial author of the instrument, and yet wished to be unknown, as we know was his policy up to that time and long after, Jefferson was placed in a somewhat embarrassing position. He neither dared to claim the authorship nor to deny it. Accordingly, in notes written on the spot, he says:

A committee was appointed to prepare a Declaration of Independence. The committee were John Adams, Dr. Franklin, Roger Sherman, Robert R. Livingston, and myself. This was reported to the House on Friday, the 28th of June, when it was read and ordered to lie on the table.

There is no acknowledgment here. Eleven years later, in 1787, he writes to the Journal de Paris a history of the events, which concludes as follows:

On the 28th of June the Declaration of Independence was reported to the House, and was laid on the table.

No acknowledgment here. Paine is in Paris, just on the eve of starting for London.

In 1809, in answer to a proposal to publish his writings, after mentioning many of them, he says:

I say nothing of numerous drafts of reports, resolutions, declarations, etc., drawn as a member of Congress or of the legislature of Virginia, such as the Declaration of Independence, report of the money mint of the United States, the act of religious freedom, etc. These having become the acts of public bodies, there can be no personal claim on them.

This was nearly three months after the death of Paine, and yet Jefferson makes no personal claim.

Ten years later he repeats his first account of the transactions, but makes no acknowledgment of authorship.

Two years later, in 1821, he again repeats the history as before, but interpolates a clause as follows:

The committee for drawing the Declaration of Independence desired me to do it. It was accordingly done, and being approved by them I reported it to the House on Friday, the 28th of June.

Here is an indirect acknowledgment. Two years later, in August, 1823, at the age of eighty, he writes:

I consented. I drew it.

Again, in 1825, he says once that he wrote it and once he drafted it. Paine had been dead sixteen years, and in the next year Jefferson died.

One remarkable passage in the Declaration was stricken out, to wit:

At this very time, too, they are permitting their chief magistrate to send over not only soldiers of our common blood, but Scotch and foreign mercenaries, to invade and destroy us.

In referring to this Jefferson said:

When the Declaration of Independence was under the consideration of Congress, there were two or three unlucky expressions in it which gave offense to some members. The words "Scotch and other foreign auxiliaries" excited the ire of a gentleman or two of that country.

Now, Jefferson never had any antipathy to the Scotch, but Paine had, as is shown by a passage in his "Prospects on the War," or "Rubicon," in 1787, where he alludes to Junius; also in numerous passages in the letters of "Casca," to say nothing of many more in the letters of Junius. But Jefferson, as might be expected, undertaking to quote Paine's draft of the Declaration, mistakes "auxiliaries" for "mercenaries," and interpolates the word "other." "Auxiliaries" is a word that Jefferson might hav written, but it is not found in the Declaration. "Mercenaries" is a word that Paine would be quite likely to use, and it occurs twice in the instrument.

The idea entertained by some that Jefferson consulted "Common Sense" in drawing the Declaration is exploded by Jefferson himself, who says:

Whether I had gathered my ideas from reading, I do not know. I know only that I turned to neither book nor pamphlet while writing it.

Of course not, for he had before him a complete draft, so that all he had to do was to copy it in his own hand.

Furthermore, it is a question whether Jefferson had even read "Common Sense," for, in speaking of Paine, he says:

His "Common Sense" was for a while believed to hav been written by Dr. Franklin, and published under the borrowed name of Paine, who had come over with him [six months before him] from England.

The name of Thomas Paine was never prefixed to the numerous early editions of "Common Sense." In the second edition he adds to the introduction this:

Who the author of this production is, is wholly unnecessary to the public, as the object for attention is the doctrin, not the man. Yet it may not be unnecessary to say that he is unconnected with any party.

And here, by the way, let me note a striking parallel between the above and a similar passage in a private letter of Junius only recently brought to light. For two years before the Junius series began the British public had been excited by a multitude of caustic anonymous letters, signed "Lucius," "Atticus," etc. The writer, being an admirer of George Grenville, addressed to him three private letters, in which he avowed his authorship of "almost everything that for two years past has attracted the attention of the public." In the last of these three letters, dated Oct. 20, 1768, he says:

It may be proper to assure you that no man knows or ever suspects the author. I hav no connection with any party.

Such was Junius and such was Paine. And this is only one of more than three hundred parallels of character, conduct, opinion, style, sentiment, and language between the two Revolutionary writers.

Only a small part of the evidence that Paine was the substantial author of the Declaration has been presented in this article. But is there not enough even here to prove not only that he was its author, but that he never intended to claim it, any more than the authorship of the Letters of Junius?

Did Jefferson, therefore, tell a lie after reaching the age of fourscore, when he said, "I drew it?" Yes, but it was, perhaps, the whitest lie a statesman ever told. Everybody believed at last that he did draw it, and how could he ever dream that forty-six years after his death Joel Moody, Esq., of Mound City, Kansas, would discover and demonstrate that Thomas Paine was the author of the Letters of Junius and the Declaration of Independence?

WM. HENRY BURR.

Washington, D. C., July 13, 1886.

Jefferson an Abolitionist.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In a late issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER is an article entitled, "Jefferson and the Declaration of Independence," in which the author says substantially that the only alterations in the Declaration as Jefferson wrote it were a few verbal changes made by Franklin and Adams as interlineations, and thus it was reported to the committee, and by the committee to Congress. I am reminded by this of the subjoined extract from an address by Hon. George G. Vest, United States senator from Missouri, delivered at the commencement exercises of the Missouri University last year. It so impressed me at the time that I clipped it out and preserved it. I do not know where the senator got his data, but hav no doubt of its correctness, as the ex-Confederate Congressman could hav no motiv in representing the great patron saint of Democracy as an Abolitionist if it were not true.

The following is the extract referred to:

It is the very irony of history that of all the slaveholding states Virginia should hav suffered most in defending an intitution forced upon her people by the greed of Old and New England, in opposition to the judgment and wishes of her most distinguished men.

As far back as 1770 Virginia had protested against the introduction of African slaves, but the protest was silenced by the royal edict, and the traffic went on.

In 1776 Jefferson framed with his own hand an indictment of the king of Great Britain in the following words:

"He has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating them and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither.

"This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of Infidel powers, is the warfare of the Christian king of Great Britain. Determined to keep open a market where men should be bought and sold, he has prostituted his negativ for suppressing every legislativ attempt to prohibit or restrain this execrable commerce.

"And that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of a distinguished dye, he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them by murdering the people on whom he has obtruded them, thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another."

These burning sentences were a part of the Declaration of Independence as originally written by Jefferson and reported to Congress, but so strong was the influence of South Carolina, Georgia, and New England in favor of the slave trade that the words were stricken out, and the Declaration was adopted as we now see it.

It is certainly to be hoped by all lovers of liberty that Mr. Vest is correct. Indeed, he must be, as our great Infidel president was true to reason on all other questions. Certainly, the language of the rejected paragraphs is in keeping with the same sentiment that formed the first sentence of that world-famous Declaration, beginning, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created free and equal."

Let us be glad that Jefferson wrote these indictments. It givs us Freethinkers a double claim on him. But gladder still let us be that the ex Confederate senator recites and applauds them as characteristic of their great author. Is it not wonderful, this evolution of ideas, that Vest can and does applaud and approve them now, and I (a scion of a slave-holding family) am rejoicing at the fact?

I am sorry to admit that I hav never read a life of Jefferson except in a biographical dictionary or encyclopedia. Perhaps if I had I might be better informed as to his antislavery principles as well as to his Infidelity. Can you cite me a reliable life of Thomas Jefferson? I don't want "Sparks's."

Freeman, Mo., July 4, 1886. T. M. HORNE.

[James Parton's "Life of Jefferson" is the book Mr. Horne will find most serviceable. "Jefferson's Works," edited by H. A. Washington, are too voluminous for ordinary purposes.—ED. T. S.]

The Beneficial Result of One Picture.

Inasmuch as a few fear that the TRUTH SEEKER illustrations will do harm, I wish to say that the picture on taxing church property prompted me to make a Fourth of July oration in which I raised the subject of church taxation before a large audience, and also I improved the opportunity to say a kind word for Thomas Paine. I got an article on the subject into a Detroit paper whose circulation is forty thousand, and again I got the subject before another forty thousand, as you can see by the following article, which you will please publish, that the fault-finders may see what good just one picture has done. Only think—some one has found a Christian neighbor who didn't like the pictures, and just one of them has caused me through the press to lay the subject of church taxation before one hundred thousand readers, of whom thousands are Christians.

Now, if your readers could induce you to publish one hundred thousand copies of that picture, with the following letter on its opposit side, for gratuitous distribution, I feel that the victory on taxing churches is ours:

MR. BABCOCK'S LETTER IN A DETROIT PAPER.

To the Editor: At a public meeting a short time since O. W. Barker, a church-member, in his speech introduced the subject of church and state. He believed in the separation of church and state, and held that the Bible in the schools is of a very doubtful policy. I followed the speaker and complimented him by indorsing his opinion, and when I said that I also believed in the taxation of church property there was an almost universal nod from the audience.

I spoke of the enormous amount of untaxed church property, and said there is $746,294,833 untaxed church property in the United States, whilst the sheriff often has to sell the property of the poor at sheriff's sale to get the tax which they were unable to pay. Rev. R. D. Stearns, the St. Johns Episcopal minister, who opened the meeting by reading a prayer, and who no doubt thinks it ill manners for one to get up and leave while he is talking, got up and left while I was talking. But why, oh, why did he leave?

Now, that I may convince the good man and others that my opinions on church taxation are well founded, and upon the principle of justice, I will, for example, speak of his own church. Hon. O. L. Spaulding, an ex-member of Congress, and rich, perhaps is the head man, and there are many others who are rich, and in all are worth $200,000 or more. Now, can't all of these rich men united afford to pay a tax on their little church, as easily as the poor widow who livs just across the street from their church can afford all alone to pay the tax on her little home? It would be more just to exempt her and tax the church than to exempt the church and tax her. Why exempt the rich and tax the poor? She must pay, or somebody pay for her, or there will be a sheriff's sale.

Now, who built and who supports the church? Why, it gets a large donation from Detroit, and its members giv a little and then send out its brigade of beggars who beg the rest. Now, after paying so little, these rich members can afford and ought to pay tax on their little church. Even I gave this church more than $100, and yet its preacher gets right up and leaves while I am talking about the justice of taxing church property!

Now, I want a law that will not oppress the widow, that will be a little easy on the poor, or else tax churches as well as others. I want the law so that when the assessor next shall call on the poor widow he can say to her, "You're excused," or else compel him to call on Rev. Mr. Stearns and if he finds that the new parsonage in which he livs cost $1,800, get out his book and mark it down. Of course, I may be wrong, but I think that I am rather sound on the subject of taxing church property.

If a man thinks so little of his God as not to be willing to help pay the tax on his house, his religion is rather poor. Trinity church, of New York, has millions of dollars on which it pays no tax; its paper would sell for one hundred cents on the dollar, but its religion, to an honest man, wouldn't sell for half of one cent on the dollar if his ideas were anything like my ideas upon the subject of religion.

St. Johns, Mich., July 16, 1886. M. BABCOCK.

Who Pays?

A false theory cannot be made to work out accurately. Protection is so false that it exposes itself in every instance where it has been tried. It is based on the theory that wages come from capitals accumumulated by taxation or some other means than by the daily exertions of the laborers. If protection is the true theory, we shall find wages best where the employers are most independent of competition—that is, where they are best protected. Coal-mine owners are protected by tariff, and also by their power of closing mines and raising prices. Surely here is the best protection conceivable. Diamond-cutters are protected by the enormous value of the material. Few persons can invest thousands of dollars in a stone. Railway companies that pool are soundly protected.

The truth is, labor creates its own wages day by day. Labor never is paid out of any other fund than that which it creates. The men who operate a railway are paid out of the earnings created by their labor. The more that is taken out of these earnings in high salaries, stock dividends, high cost for materials, the less there is to reward labor. The whole system of labor is so delicately adjusted that any abnormal interference puts all out. The higher your wages, the less must be mine.

The laborers are vitally interested in the largest, healthiest consumption possible. It is consumption givs labor employment, not increased profit or capital. The moment you strike at consumption you assault labor. The most fatal stroke at consumption is given by unnecessary increased prices. Our sole hope is in the demand of the great masses who are women and children. They can afford no dear luxuries.

But will not very low prices make wages low? No. So long as there is the least profit left, wages keep pace with consumption. Meanwhile the laborer finds his savings are really increased, because he gets the advantage of the general low prices. If railway fare and living get so low that their cost is a trifle, comparativly, the laborer is on an equality with the wealthiest. To labor is no misfortune. No rich man can possibly, in the nature of things, enjoy life as much as do the poor, when all the opportunities of travel, of living, are so cheap that the laborer can use them. The richest man has by nature more means of enjoyment than the poorest. On the other hand, kind Mother Nature has declared that whatever we are too familiar with becomes common and inferior.

The day must come when all these great discoveries and improvements shall inure to the benefit of the great masses. It only needs that they shall understand that every great public need be administered by the people for the common weal, such as banking, transportation of persons and property, insurance, telegraphy, etc., so that the immense profits of all such shall go to the people in reduced taxation and better opportunities.

Were governments properly administered instead of taxation there would be distribution to the masses.

Take away taxation and where would protection be? which is really taxing many for a few, a wretched violation of first principles.

Every steel rail on our roads has cost several dollars more than necessary because the men who own the roads control the manufacture of the rails, and charge the public more for freight, etc., to repay themselvs. Is not this monstrous?

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Up Paradise Valley, shining in the sun, along the sweeping Yellowstone and the range of mighty hills so precipitous that it seems as if mortal foot could never touch their towering peaks, by the solemn face of the sphinx who appears to be aweary of the problem of the ages, to Mt. Cinnabar and the Giant's Wall, smooth as the masonry of man, we go; and to the Devil's Slide—and a devil of a slide his majesty must hav had adown that bloody trail. I don't believe he had a particle of breeches left when he got through. He must hav been the "naked truth" itself when at the bottom. I wish that every devil—of a religion—could take such a slide as that.

At Cinnabar we exchanged the iron horse and its train for the stage coaches and rolled away beneath the solemn and gray peaks of Mt. Sepulcher to Mammoth Hot Springs. Here the Cap of Liberty and the Devil's Thumb were on guard at the foot of the Terraces—the infinit-hued and crystal gates to the Wonderland.

We passed the night at Cottage Hotel, and in the morning the sun flung its gorgeous banners over the beginning of our fairy journey. National Park is larger than Rhode Island and Delaware put together, and so it is no small task to survey in a five days' march its many attractions.

Our friend Henderson is a Scotch philosopher after the manner of Hume. He is a keen student, and also a poetic sight-seer. He knows all about the Park. He has examined every nook and corner, and compelled each water-drop to yield its sparkling secret. He has plucked the heart of its mystery from the grim mountain, the rugged rock, and darksome cave. He knows the history of every geyser, from its first bubble to its splendid maturity. If one wants a pleasant and profitable traveling companion he must take Henderson, who can show him more and tell him more than a dozen ordinary guides.

We had the fortune to secure the services of this "gray man of the Hermit's Cave," and of course we disdained the ordinary stage route and purposed to take a free Bohemian ride through the Park—camping where we would by stream or lake or in the heart of a volcano—for only to the daring adventurer will this wild region yield the "immediate jewel of its soul." It has a noble scorn for the ruts of an orthodox journey. Only he who follows every whim and caprice can know the glory of this fantastic world.

We were not alone. There was a genial company, and the grace of humanity was added to the grandeurs of nature, and thus the poetic conditions of life were fulfilled. Humanity without nature is stupid. Nature without humanity is monotonous. Mingling together, there is the effluence of electric life.

Our party was made up of Mr. G. L. Henderson, our guide and philosopher; his daughter, Miss Nellie Henderson, and her friends from Dakota, Miss May and Miss Emma Poole—who, being born into the air of Liberalism, knew how to enjoy nature with untrammeled minds. I always thought Dakota was to the far West, but when I understood that these friends had traveled nearly a day and a half to reach the Park I came to the conclusion that Dakota, like Maine, was away down East. I really wondered where I was, and if New York was not in some other planet. Mr. Wm. S. McLellan, of California, was also with us—a first-rate traveling companion, for he knew how to cook, pitch a tent, harness a horse, wash dishes, catch fish, and shoot a bear if necessary. These are the kind of friends to hav on a camping expedition—who are full of good nature and never grumble nor scold. They help to make the rough places smooth.

I must not forget our horses Tobie and Tom. They are the most famous horses in the Park. They hav a transatlantic reputation. They can go right down a precipice almost as easily as along an ordinary road. They can draw as much as four animals of the average caliber. They are thoroughly good-natured, and work and eat with equal relish. They hav a heap of horse-sense, and are worthy of a harp—if they can play one—equally with many a saint. If I meet them on the other side of Jordan I shall shake hands or "hoof it" with them to my great satisfaction.

With such an outfit there's no such word as fail any more than in "the bright lexicon of youth." In the happy morning we went forth. First we passed the Cathedral Rock, which loomed over like the solemnity of the ancient church, and seemed at one time to occupy all the sky; but as we pressed on and up toward the Golden Gate it diminished its eminence and Bunsen's Peak shone above it triumphantly superior, like the brow of science itself. We pass the Golden Gate with its natural tower, and a lovely picture bursts upon our view—the falls of the Gardener floating like the exquisit drapery on the bridal head of some fair lady. We drank as if from some enchanted cup of the limpid waters that leaped to such glorious beauty. On we passed into Swan Lake Park. Here the snow peaks appeared in view—the Electric Mountain, brilliant with color, the King's Crown Bell, the Quadrant, the Pyramids, where the white banners of winter still flung their defiant lusters over the green valleys and plains. Across the Indian Creek and into the pleasant groves our journey proceeds, and at noon we camp beside an ice-cold fountain whose waters are as delicious as ever touched the parched lips of the traveler. In the afternoon we reach Norris's Basin, where for the first time we look upon the wonderful geysers. The Constant or Minute Man dashed its torrents of boiling water to the sky at frequent and regular intervals. The Blue Volcano roared and bubbled; Whirlwind Hurricane sent forth its burning flood, which mysteriously disappears no one knows where; the Emerald Fountain spread its wondrous sheen as if its bosom were filled with jewels. The Monarch and Venus remained in obdurate quiescence, and would not declare their glory. So we passed on over the wide wooded ranges, and in early evening camped on the edge of the broad and beautiful Elk Park, through which like a winding looking-glass flows the Gibbon river. Beside its bank, amid a dozen or so of tall trees at the foot of Mt. Schurz, we found a convenient place, and instantly unpacked and pitched the tent and ate our suppers. After that we climbed a thousand feet over the rugged breast of Mt. Schurz to the Monument Geysers. These towered upon our sight like solemn ancient gravestones, as if here dead giants had found a burial-place—and perhaps they were roasting beneath, for from several pinnacles the steam was roaring forth. Close by is the Chromatic Canyon, blazing with a thousand colors, sweeping down to the banks of the Gibbon river. We remained in these weird chambers of the ages past until the wings of darkness began to fall, and then we ourselvs tumbled down the mountain in reckless fashion, like children at play, and in a few minutes were in the grassy meadows again, ready for a night's sleep. I had not made my bed on the ground since I was one of Uncle Sam's boys in blue, when lugging a musket and knapsack made the hardest kind of a rock a downy bed of ease. I enjoyed the outre experience, looking from my grassy cot to the infinit sky which was my roof, fretted with golden fire. Some of the stars seemed to be dancing in the tree-tops. I could hear the geysers afar off bursting and moaning on the mountain-top. The horses munched and munched and I thought they never would get through eating. I lay awake until midnight, somewhat "God-intoxicated," like Spinoza, everything about me was so curious, awful, and enchanting. Such a vast lodging-house, all for nothing, was quite bewildering. I had to stretch myself to the utmost capacity in order to realize that I had any existence at all. I felt sort of minute on that "everlasting couch" where so many millions were sleeping in the story below. Anon I would hear a faint music, a very exquisit strain, and I did not know but that I was to pass through the experience of my Theosophical friend Chainey, and that some soft spiritual hand was to be placed upon my burning brow, and that delicious dreams would come. Oh, no; it was not an angel coming, but a musketo, and incontinently I ducked my head beneath the heavy canvas quilt which served for a covering. I always dodge musketoes—celestial glory to the contrary notwithstanding. I don't like their bills; they are worse than lawyers' or doctors' bills. I'll giv them a check every time—a bank-check if I hav it; that is, a sand-bank; or a note of hand with crushing effect. The sublime and ridiculous are always mingling in human life. I hardly ever contemplate some bright orb where "love might be immortal," but I am constrained to vigorously slap a musketo without any regard to consequences. Such is "the woven web of things that be." Finally, however, in spite of stars and musketoes and geysers and coyotes and mountain lions and flitting bats and shadowy horses and dancing trees, I went to sleep and awoke just as the sun was sending its first fiery darts over the eastern fringe of hills, and with such an appetite that I no longer wondered that horses ate till midnight.

At this place, Camp Douglass, we met with Mr. James Hedges, and Mr. Jonas Hedges, and Mr. B. W. Baker, who were on a tour through the Park. They were old campaigners, miners, good fellows, and ready to lend a hand. We found them an exceedingly pleasant addition to our little company, and we traveled together for the rest of the trip.

Wednesday morning we wound along the Gibbon river, over the Golden Ford, whose smooth bottom glistens through the flowing stream up and across the Gibbon range. About nine o'clock we reached Gibbon Falls, tumbling and glittering twelve hundred feet below our track. It was almost a break-neck undertaking to get to the foot of the Falls down the steep and rocky embankment. The view, however, amply repaid the toil. The careering waters presented a lovely picture. As I touched my lips to the bright current I could imagin that I was drinking from the foaming goblet of the gods. Close by was a cave ornamented with lustrous green moss and grass, fit boudoir for a nymph. I really thought I might see one. My heart was ready, if not my head. In its cosiest corner was a nest with three little birds chirping unanimously for food, while the mother was flying anxiously about. I wish that everybody was as musical as a bird when hungry. What a world of harmony we should hav, for about nine-tenths of the human race are hungry all the time!

About noon we reached Parnassus Basin, the home of poetry, where the "Raven," "Fritchie's Well," the "Heart of Evangeline," and "Thanatopsis, or the Big Blue," painted by Moran, spread their wondrous colors. Deep down we look into the bosom of the earth, unfathomable spaces rich with emerald azure and mingling tints that no words can describe. The brilliant movements of the waters, now almost still, then bursting in white bubbles and streams, and radiating to the mobile surface, was simply intoxicating in its marvelous wealth of splendor. After dinner the Great Fountain gave us a gorgeous dessert in the shape of one of its most ample ebullitions. It rises to the hight of one hundred and fifty feet, with massiv columns crossing one another in their upward course, shooting athwart like shining adversaries, and falling to the earth in one glorious tomb.

Near by are the Painted Pots, one of the most curious workshops in this laboratory of nature. It seems as if a troop of fairies were in those magic depths making all sorts of flowers to adorn the variegated surface. There is a continual motion, and white, purple, and crimson roses, lilies, sunflowers, tulips, etc., form before the eye in perfect beauty, some remaining for several minutes, and others coming and going at a breath. It was like moving marble shimmering into an ever-changing flower garden.

At evening's hour we pitched in front of Old Faithful. Just at supper-time it surged upward and waved its banners over our Boston baked beans. Boston was nowhere, and so we ate the beans all up. We then roamed amid the Hundred Geysers of the Upper Basin. The Lion and the Lioness spouted to our satisfaction. The Giantess was mute; when she will she will, and when she won't she won't. We saw the Ingersoll, beautiful and dashing; brilliant in all its phases, as it should be in honor of its name; also the Castle, almost constantly throwing out its jeweled picket-lines to see whether or not it should send forth its grand eruption and surpass its gleaming foes. The Saw-mill sputtered and seemed to be hard at work over some unruly log; the Grand and the Splendid made no motion; the Mugwump, however, made itself notable with its tremendous kicking; the Stalwart rose in steady columns; the Four Sisters gleamed in golden attire; the Specimen flashed its thousand colors to greet the sun; the Devil's Punch Bowl was on hand (the devil knows how to enjoy life, for he keeps his punch bowl at the boiling-point); the Giant was mum, and has been for three months, while the Fat Woman's Grotto arched its romantic roof. What a land of enchantment I seemed to be in! The silver moon arose, and all the night was charming. I could scarcely sleep. I heard the soft, vast thunder of the geysers. They flung their radiant pennons forth in blending masses, with innumerable trumpet tones, as if, like the Titans of old, they were summoning their glittering ranks to scale the battlements of heaven. The morning came. The vapors rose like polished silver. As we bade farewell to that grand and lovely scene, mingling the terrific with the most exquisit elegance of nature's art, Old Faithful shot aloft his brightest display, sending the diamond showers two hundred feet in air, and the rolling steam three times that distance overhead, spreading over the groves and the thousand-hued earth like the floating roof of some mighty palace.

In the early forenoon of Thursday we came to Hell's Half Acre. If I were going to hell, I should come here. It would satisfy any ordinary sinner to plunge into this boiling abyss. It needs no New Version. Sheol is no name for it. From it, in bright contrast, flows the River of Gold into the tumbling Fire Hole river. Not far off is Paradise Lake, over whose bosom roll the painted clouds, like the imagined gates of heaven, and around whose margin a thousand rainbows seem to be spread. The Curtain Lake appears, like the the entrance to some underground theater where mermaids sing and play, and trip the light fantastic toe.

We took dinner at Ehret's, and a royal feast it was. Ehret joined our forces for a fishing excursion, and we thanked our stars, for we knew we should hav a glorious supper of trout. We camped that night at Trout Creek Park, where bears do occasionally haunt and flare upon affrighted passengers. Ehret went a-fishing—so did I—in a winding valley that I might imagin was the Vale of Tempe, if it were not for the millions of musketoes. I believe the musketo is not a classical animal. We caught a hundred or more fish. It will never be recorded on the pages of history how many of those fish I caught. I caught some, but I ate more than I caught. So much for coöperation. I believe in it with all my heart—and digestiv apparatus.

Early Friday morn we are off to the Grand Canyon. All along the way the vast and shining ranges of Mount Washburn seem to beckon us on to the enchanted palace, where nature had wrought its master work. At eleven o'clock we arrive, eat a hasty meal, and hurry along the steep pathway to Lookout Point. What shall I say? It seemed when I first looked upon that tremendous abyss that every atom of my body would dissolve, and I were as nothing in that bewildering world of wonder and terror. I had to close my eyes for a moment, as if a blaze of fire were sweeping across my vision. The magnificence of color is almost intolerable, as if some wandering sun had gone to wreck in this canyon, and set each burning hue in the immutable rocks. This wide circle of awful lusters might seem the marriage-ring of earth with eternity, for never did the earth stand revealed with such delicate and ravishing loveliness, close by "the throne of the invisible, the eternal endless and sublime." Dreams vanish here, for the reality is all-absorbing. Who can paint it? What winged words can catch the marvel and bear it away? Two thousand feet below rolls the Emerald river. To the right the Alabaster falls leap down three hundred and sixty feet. From its seething base the mists arise one hundred and eighty feet, with crowns of glowing rainbows. The massiv walls stretch for miles, brilliant from top to bottom with crimson, and yellow, and red—with fires of gold, ochre flames, jets of emerald, and fringes of radiant green. Half-way down the vast chamber soars the eagle at a dizzying hight above the waters beneath, that seem, like jewels, to be melting and flowing away. I thought I might step across that tiny ribbon of light; and yet it is a hundred feet across. Far down the gulf castles, turrets, temples, minarets, domes, and pinnacles present themselvs, as if a thousand busy hands had been at work through the centuries. Indeed, the genii of the waters hav given us of their noblest skill. The sweeping Yellowstone has been a mighty architect. It has had a magnificent theater, and played its part well. It has wrought a gorgeous drama, and shall receive our applause—of silence, "which speaks the o'erfraught heart."

At two o'clock we resume our journey, taking a short cut of twelve miles over the Washburne range. The road was newly made. There were about a million stumps to circumnavigate. Our carriage heaved and tossed like a ship on an angry sea. However, we weathered the "storm and stress," and anchored safely in Norris's Basin. The next day a twenty-five mile ride brought us to Terrace Mountain, down whose precipitous sides our horses safely scrambled, though it did seem at times as if we were swinging in mid-air, and were going up instead of down. We stopped at Orange Geyser, took a bath in the Lake, went to Stalactite Cave, the Cave of Death, the Hermit's Cave, the River Styx, Jacob's Ladder, the Devil's Kitchen, the White Elephant Terrace, and so down the shining terraces, where the restless springs hav deftly built the crystal halls—wondrous architecture, "frozen music" indeed. One might linger for days at the entrance of the Park, and if he would discover every marvel he would go no farther than these crystalline stairways. The eternal march of atoms makes a new glory with every rising sun.

Tired and hungry I come to Cottage Hotel, a wiser, but not a sadder man—happier, because I love my Mother Earth more dearly than ever. I am proud to be her offspring. I will never desert her for heaven. To be buried with her grandeur and beauty and perish with her, is all I desire when life's conscious task is ended. I want no harp of gold, but the singing of her leaves, and the music of her glorious waters.

A good sleep and a square meal revive me, and in the evening air, with the silver moon before me in the sky, and the radiant clouds and the mountains all steeped in golden lusters, I meditativly watch the Cap of Liberty. It is now ten thousand years old. I hav no doubt that Adam played truant about its base and that Mother Eve made mud pies in this very spot, and placed her doll in the Devil's Thumb, and rocked it to sleep on the Elephant's back, and baked her apple in the Devil's Kitchen. This is the veritable garden of Eden. I think if friend Henderson continues his researches he will find the "missing link," and thus complete the attractions of the Park.

Good-bye, Park—health-giving and strength-giving, with summer's sun and winter's snow. Good-bye, pleasant friends. We hav met like ships on a sunny sea, and our voyage will be happier for the brief greetings. The sweetness and sublimity of nature are now woven with every toil upon its rugged breast.

Hereafter the fields of labor, the seed-time and the harvest, the morning and the evening of each day's work, will hav a nobler significance. Truth shall be grander and hope more beautiful.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Tent.

MONTEZUMA, CAYUGA CO., N. Y.—Since my last report we hav had most intensely disagreeable weather—storm, heavy showers, sunshine, and fierce wind. Yet the interest in our meetings was unabated. On Thursday, 15th, we had about 2 o'clock P.M. a juvenil cyclone and infantil deluge. I examined the stakes, and drove down two that appeared doubtful. The wind blew in fitful gusts, and it rained in torrents. I sat on the corner of the platform from which I speak and cast a glance around, deciding that all was secure; a sudden snap like the report of a pistol, a terrific gust of wind—we jumped, and the same instant the stakes on one side pulled up and the center-pole snapped like a pipestem in the center and descended with fearful force, striking on the very spot from which I had so hastily removed—a wonderfully close shave—and our Christian friends hav yet to wait for that funeral which undoubtedly will be well attended—if it don't rain.

It was not a jubilant moment, for we knew the Tent was down bad. The amount of damage done was, until the storm abated, difficult to determin. In extremity we thought of our genial friend Putnam, and resorted to poetry. I repaired to the little Tent, singing:

> There's a land that is hotter than this,
> And by faith we can smell it afar,
> Where the saintly ones sizzle and siss,
> And the parsons and good deacons are.

Not original, for we hav no talent in that direction. The words are those of the genial Elias H. Gault.

Friends soon gathered to the rescue. Christians were jubilant—no more lectures on Infidelity; their prayers were answered, and the Lord had overruled. Within an hour the center-pole was replaced, all damages repaired, the stakes redriven, and all in first-class order, to the astonishment of our Christian onlookers and the joy of all the friends. And I spoke that night on "The Saints of the Bible" with much of zest and to the evident instruction and delight of a goodly assembly.

I hav not missed one lecture until Sunday morning 11th inst.—rain in torrents interspersed with sunshine. It held up in the afternoon so we were enabled to giv "Defense of Satan," but had to postpone the organization of the Montezuma Secular Union until evening, preceding the lecture of Mrs. Reynolds on "Woman: Past, Present, and Future." Nineteen members joined the organization. The following officers were elected: Edward Ross, president; Mrs. Charles Traver, vice-president; Charles Traver, secretary; C. Higgins, treasurer. Vigilance Committee, Geo. Eckart, M. Muller, and Mrs. Sarah Ross. Educational Committee, Andrew Rodgers, Charles Traver, and Mrs. Sarah Ross. Social Committee, Frank Kern, John J. Mallory, Mrs. Charles Traver.

Mrs. Reynolds returns home, and I go to Boonton, N. J., cheered and encouraged by the good success at Montezuma. They hav already the nucleus of a library.

Now let all desiring Tent effort write me at once, and all New York Liberals prepare for a glorious successful meeting of the New York Freethinkers' Association. The cause requires that every man and woman do their duty, and help by their presence to boom the cause in the Empire state. I am much in favor of White Sulphur Springs as the place to hold the Convention, on account of its nearness to Saratoga, fares to the latter being very low from all points. From New York city to Saratoga and return the fare is but $4.50, and an excursion ticket from Saratoga to White Sulphur Springs costs but 25 cents. White Sulphur Springs, then, is the place.

Chicago Secular News.

Wm. F. Fury was the gentleman who delivered the last lecture before the adjournment of the Secular Union. I heard the other day that he had been arrested and indicted by the grand jury for, it is alleged, wrongfully using his position as notary public. As Mr. Fury is an outspoken Freethinker, and was well acquainted with Fielden and others, I am pretty sure this is a trumped-up charge to deprive him of his liberty and the possibility of his befriending them. The idea that the old gentleman would commit or connive at any serious offense for the petty fee of 25 cents (and I am told he did not even get that) is simply preposterous. However, I shall soon know more of this. A man who, educated in Ireland for the priesthood, refused to take "holy orders," and for many, many years has proclaimed for mental freedom is not the kind of man to stoop to such miserable trickery. Unfortunately, friend Fury livs in a neighborhood whose residents devoutly desire, with Mr. Tenney, that all such people be hung. His friend, Justice Fleming, is his bail.

Rome is beginning to run Chicago more boldly than ever, and the preachers hav been helping them by their soft-headed prating of late, in ascribing all the virtues to the Irish, since no Irishman is indicted with the Anarchists.

Sunday's Tribune had an alarmist editorial on the "dangerous character of the armed organization known as the Lehr und Wehr Verein," which Informer Waller, who confesses to being bought by the police for a job and twenty-two dollars and fifty cents, to testify against the Anarchists, incriminated by his testimony. "Now that its real object has been exposed," shrieks the Tribune, "that it stands revealed as the armed force of Socialism, and that it is being convicted of being the public enemy, it is time that its fangs should be drawn;" and further declares that there is no "necessity for good citizens who respect the laws to organize for defense. The law itself is amply able to defend them." On another page the Tribune lauds the "The Conservators' League of America," a new secret organization started by the labor agitations of the last year. These conservators propose to protect the business of the country against all unlawful and injurious interference. Strange as it may appear, we are informed by the Tribune that it has a secret military organization that will come to the front in case of such riots as that of May 1st. The officers of the supreme council are then given, and these men are found to be bankers, judges, brokers, manufacturers, and merchants. The Tribune says this is a counterpart of the "Union League, which, during the war, kept copperheads within bounds, only the Conservators' League proposes to deal with Socialists and strikers." Just so; but these men, according to the Tribune editorial of the same day, cannot be "good citizens," as no good citizens need arm themselvs, the law being all-sufficient. This the Tribune neglected to state in the article referring to the Conservators, League.

Facts About the New Testament.

PREFATORY.

I hav written some articles which I thought might interest the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. They set forth my ideas on theological matters. These articles were not designed for such men as Ingersoll, Wakeman, Palmer, or Putnam, who hav thoroughly investigated these matters for themselvs. They were written for a class of individuals whose attention has never been turned to these subjects.

Few realize the difficulties which beset a bread-winner when he attempts to do any literary work.

These articles hav been written, in part, on my knee, in intervals from business of five, ten, and sometimes not more than one minute. Oftentimes I am called from my work and an idea or sentence is jerked in two. This has been a great source of annoyance, hence it is expected that these circumstances will be duly considered and the mantle of charity thrown over any defects which may appear.

With the many hindrances, it has taken me a long time to gather the facts for these articles, and the whole field should hav been gone over again and the matter better arranged, but I hav not the time.

Imperfect as these articles are, I apprehend that the facts will not be denied. My object has been to present some facts which could never be learned in the churches, in such a plain and simple manner that they may be available to a class of readers who would not be likely to search them out for themselvs. These articles will embrace:

1. "Facts About the New Testament."
2. "The Church and Its Influence."
3. "Christian Absurdities."
4. "Miracles and Miracle Workers."
5. "The Gods on Exhibition."

It is only expected that these articles will serve as a stepping-stone to something higher; but it is believed that if the facts were thoroughly digested it would break up all faith and confidence in every system of supernatural religion. For an argument against any so-called revealed religion will apply with more or less force to them all.

And, if it is a fact, as I believe it is, that nature and her laws are all there is, then man will never be truly blessed until the last vestige of the supernatural disappears.

I hav heard the minister say that "no good man will speak against the New Testament."

If it can be made to appear that the New Testament had its origin in fraud and deception, should a man be denounced for exposing the fraud, and be put down as a monster in whom good men cannot confide?

The praises of the New Testament hav been preached and sung and prayed into the mind of the Christian until he has become so biased that he regards the Freethinker as a sort of moral leper or purgatorial outlaw whom he may despise and spit upon with impunity; a being whom God will delight to damn and devils delight to torment. The teachings of the New Testament, as we shall see, generate such a spirit.

If the Christian should be asked when the New Testament was written, or by whom it was written, or when Christ was born, but one honest answer could be given, and that would be, "I do not know."

Nothing would surprise the average Christian more than to be told that other gospels had been written besides those contained in the New Testament. Waite, who perhaps is as good an authority as any modern writer, speaks of the "numerous gospels in circulation in the second century;" and says of these, "Not more than three can be traced to the time of the apostles." These are the Gospel of Paul, the Recollections of Peter, and the Oracles of Christ. And yet not one of these is found in the New Testament.

Origen says, "Not only four gospels were written, but very many out of which those we hav were chosen." Since these four gospels were chosen or selected from the "very many" which were written, will some Christian inform me what evidence he has that the right ones were selected?

It would be an equal surprise to the Christian to be told that during the life of Christ, and for many years after, nobody regarded him as a risen savior. The early fathers believed him to be the son of Joseph, born in the natural way.

As for his being born of a virgin and begotten in a supernatural way, it is not mentioned by any Christian, heathen, or Jewish writer for more than a hundred years.

History furnishes the most undoubted evidence that the miraculous part of his life was all fixed up and flavored to suit the demands of a plotting priesthood many, many years after it was said to hav taken place. The truth seems to be that Christ came preaching a new doctrin, not so much of supernatural religion, but a doctrin based on the equality and brotherhood of the human race, and he left an indelible impression upon the minds of those who heard him.

Afterward, to giv force to the Christian doctrin—which was imputed to him, but which he never preached—he was created into a god, and divine honors were paid to him, as were paid to Zoroaster, Chrishna, Buddha, Confucius, Apollonius, Simon Magus, and many others.

But a man born in the ordinary way would make a poor god, and the immaculate conception was needed to giv force and consistency to the doctrin of his divinity.

Paul was the great character in early Christian history, and he persecuted the Christians with a malignity born of vengeance. And after what was called his conversion he manifested the same savage disposition to those who opposed the new system which he was trying to build up. I cannot believe that a good man would persecute for opinion's sake.

The temper which he manifested to women shows that with all his religious light from on high he did not rise above the prejudices of the times in which he lived. Every Christian woman would feel shocked if the least word should be lisped against St. Paul. No man did more than he to degrade and enslave woman, and send her chains clanking down through the ages.

It is claimed that Paul never married, but it is said by the early fathers that he often spoke of his wife, whom he did not take about with him, but claimed the right to take a sister wife while engaged in the ministry. No wonder the ministers are so much in love with St. Paul.

The Epistles of Paul are believed to be the oldest Christian writings extant. What is most wonderful, neither Paul nor Clement, the only Christian writers of the first century, makes the slightest allusion to the miracles of Christ.

In the Epistle of Clement it is stated that when Paul laid his hand on him as his successor, he declared that whoever should grieve the president of truth would sin against Christ, and offend the father of all. From that day, as the church gained power, it has been the instrument of persecution. And it took a great deal of persecution, and fraud, and misrepresentation to establish the divinity and the miracles of Christ.

It must be borne in mind that Christ lived in an age of miracles, and all men (and their number was very great, as we shall see) who laid claim to divinity were miracle-workers, and miraculously begotten.

But the Christian will insist that Christ was an emanation from God, otherwise how could he raise the dead, heal the sick, turn water into wine, cause the blind to see, the lame to walk, walk on the water, and feed a vast multitude on a couple of fishes and a half-dozen hardtack? Now, my Christian friend, I would like to ask you, Did you see Christ perform those miracles? Did you ever see a man who did see him perform them?

"No; but Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John say they were performed." But what do you know about the veracity of those gentlemen? In a matter of so much importance as a violation of the laws of nature, we certainly hav a right to inquire into the character of men who make such statements.

In the first place, you do not know who Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John was. You never hav read a line of their writings, nor do you know that they ever wrote at all. All you do know is that somebody, and you do not know who, wrote gospels according to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

If one should see a history according to Gibbon, he would not infer that Gibbon wrote the history, but that some one else had written it following the plan of Gibbon, abridging or enlarging or in some way making it different from Gibbon's history. Will some intelligent Christian inform me who these gentlemen were who wrote according to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John?

But this is not the worst of the trouble. Somebody, we don't know who, wrote according to Luke, and it is well known that Luke wrote according to Marcion, and Marcion wrote according to Paul, and whether Paul wrote according to somebody else we hav no means of knowing.

A relates that a dead man arose out of the grave. When closely questioned, he says he only told the story according to the statement of B. B says he told it according to C, and C is utterly unable to tell when or where the story originated. This is exactly a parallel case, and shows positivly the sum total of all that is known about the reliability of the wonderful and miraculous statements of the New Testament.

Look at the introduction to the gospel according to St. Luke. It begins in this way:

> Forasmuch as many hav taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are surely believed among us, even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, it seemed good in me, also having had perfect understanding of all things from the very first, to write to thee in order, etc.

This is a remarkable passage of scripture, and I offer it in confirmation of what I hav said. To use a homely phrase, the one who writes according to Luke, whoever he may be, lets the cat out of the bag. He flatly admits that he had seen nothing, knew nothing, only what had been written or told before, or, as he expressed it, "as they delivered them unto us." It is evident that these stories were hawked about, told by one to another, and came down from "away back" in the "beginning," when there were "eye-witnesses."

Who were those men who "delivered" those "things" unto the author of Luke? Were they inspired men? If so, they must hav written in the most perfect manner all that we need to know. If they were not inspired, how do we know that they "delivered" the right information to the one who wrote according to Luke?

If he had nothing but the say-so or the writings of somebody else to write from or about, why should the author of Luke write at all? If God inspired those men to write, did he withhold a part of the truth, or inspire them to write what was not true? If those writers were not inspired to write at all, what does the book according to Luke amount to, as an inspired book?

The truth is, the author of Luke was inspired by the same motiv that inspired hundreds of others. The times were crammed with inspired writers. Everybody wrote whatever he thought would bolster up the Christian religion, without any regard to the eternal fitness of things. Waite says, "Nobody knows who wrote the book of Luke, or when it was written." Remember it is not Luke who wrote the book which bears his name, but somebody else who wrote according to Luke. The Christian will say: "Although I do not know who wrote according to Luke, I know he wrote the truth, otherwise how could the miracles which he records obtain currency? It is not an easy matter to make the people believe that one has arisen from the dead unless a miracle has been performed."

The Christian infers that the miracles of Christ should be taken as evidence of his divinity, but forgets that, before the miracles can be taken as evidence, it must be proved that they actually occurred.

But why should the Christian lay such stress on the miracles of Christ? All things considered, he was no extraordinary miracle-worker. I do not know of a single miracle recorded of him more wonderful than turning all the waters of a great country into blood. Yet the "magicians" did this in Egypt. In the seventh chapter of Exodus will be found an account of the "magicians'" turning rods into serpents, and a great many other wonderful feats, fully up to the best that Christ ever did.

He never did equal the miracles of Apollonius or Simon Magus. The miracles of Mohammed far transcend the miracles of Christ. One can account for the miracles of Christ as easily as for the miracles of Mohammed, or Apollonius, or Simon Magus, or for the wonderful feats of the magicians down in Egypt.

Waite says: "From the middle of the second century, and even earlier, the world was flooded with anonymous writings of a religious character, filled with miracles of every description. There was a morbid demand for that kind of literature. There were Acts, Revelations, Epistles, etc." With such a windfall of miracles and such a cyclone of sacred writers, each one telling his own story, and no two agreeing, is it any wonder that council after council had to be called to unravel the holy tangle?

If the Christians of the present day could hav been present at some of these councils, and seen the pious seeds of the church kick and cuff each other in their quarrels about what should be God's word and what should not, they would begin to see that their reverence for a certain book is just as foolish as to reverence any other book.

It must be borne in mind that the art of printing was unknown. The masses did not read, as in later times. Every Christian who could write was busy, and wrote whatever he thought would bolster up his religion. But they did not agree. God did not instruct them all alike, and these contradictory writings multiplied until there were over 150,000 different readings.

These various and conflicting writings were sifted through council after council, in order to find out which was inspired by God, and which men had written on their own hook. Parts which were adopted at one council were rejected at another, and finally, as a result of all these councils, there remains but a small portion of what was originally written, which we call the New Testament.

The book of Luke became the word of God by one vote. If one man had voted differently, the book of Luke would not hav been the word of God. So the Christian can see on what a slender thread his word of God hangs.

The men who voted upon these important matters, upon which hangs the eternal happiness or misery of the whole human race, were only erring, fallible mortals like ourselvs. Nobody ever claimed that they were inspired, yet upon the mere "guess-so" of these men hangs the sanctity of the New Testament.

It might be well to notice briefly some of the writings which were considered sacred in an early day, and which were rejected by the church councils. The Protevangelion is one of the books which was written, and has the appearance of being just as sacred as any book of the New Testament. It is related in this gospel that Mary, the mother of Christ, was fed by an angel. When she was twelve years old, the high priests met with divining-rods to determin what to do with her. The last rod was taken by Joseph, and a dove came out of the rod and flew upon Joseph's head. The priests determined that Joseph should take the young virgin to wife. Joseph refused, saying: "I am an old man, and hav children. She is young, and I shall appear ridiculous in Israel."

Joseph returned from building houses, and found her with child, and reproved her. He was accused of seduction, and was required to drink holy water, which he did unharmed, and was acquitted. Joseph and Mary entered a cave, where Jesus was born. A bright cloud overshadowed it, and Salome came to the cave and doubted the virginity of Mary, whereupon her right hand withered. She prayed to the Lord, and an angel instructed her to take the young child in her arms, and her hand was made whole.

As everything holy must smack of the miraculous, the mountains opened; the roofs of the temple howled and were rent from the top to the bottom; Zacharias was killed, and his blood congealed to stone, and much more of the same sort.

Now, my Christian comrade, do you believe that the blood of Zacharias congealed to stone? No, you do not believe it. But you do believe that a man's blood can turn to milk, because that is found in the New Testament.

Do you believe that a dove came out of a little wooden rod? Of course you don't. But you do believe that walls of solid masonry were blown down with ram's horns, because it is so stated in the holy Bible. Now, my dear Christian pet, don't be so anxious to get to heaven that you won't wait to reason a little.

Don't you see that it is all a matter of Sunday-school education which one of these impossible stories you believe? And don't you see that if you had not been brought up on asses' milk you would hav believed neither the one or the other. The Protevangelion was rejected at the church councils as spurious. A difference of a few votes would hav made this gospel the word of God, and then the average Christian would hav believed the wonderful statements in the Protevangelion as he now does the impossible statements in the New Testament. This ought to satisfy the Christian how little God had to do in these matters.

Whether this gospel, attributed to James, is true or false, the gospel of Luke, and the gospel of Matthew, with additions and alterations, were made up from it. If this gospel were true, were we not entitled to it? If untrue, of what value can the parts be which were taken from it by the authors of Luke and Matthew? "The Gospel of the Infancy" is another wonderful production. It relates more wonderful things of Christ than Christians generally dream of. The miracles of Christ as related in the New Testament are tame and commonplace as compared with what is recorded in this gospel.

This remarkable production winds up in this remarkable way, viz: "The end of the whole of the Gospel of the Infancy, by the assistance of the supreme God, according to what we find in the original."

This shows how one gospel has been taken from another and altered and amended until, in many instances, it is impossible to decide who the author was, or when he wrote, or who did the altering or amending.

JOHN PECK.

Proof Positiv that Philip Francis was Not Junius.

A few days ago I found and bought a book entitled, "The Handwriting of Junius," London, 1871, containing fac similes of all the private letters of Junius, and a great number of the letters of Philip Francis. In this book an attempt is made to prove by comparison of handwriting that Francis was Junius. On page 200 of the handwriting is a letter written by Francis to his brother-in-law, Alexander Macrabie, in Philadelphia, and it is dated:

LONDON, Nov. 4th, 1769.

Turning back to page 36 of the handwriting there is a fac simile of Junius's private letter to his publisher, Woodfall (No. 11, conjecturally dated Nov. 8, 1769), and it begins thus:

Sir: I hav been out of town these three weeks, and, though I got your last, could not conveniently answer it.

This, like nearly all the private letters of Junius to his publisher, is not dated. But in it he requests Woodfall to "reprint a letter in the London Evening Post of last night to the Duke of Grafton." That letter is dated Nov. 10, 1769, and is signed "A. B.," who was not Junius. (See Misc. Let., No. lxi.) Therefore the private letter, instead of being written Nov. 8th, must be dated as late as Nov. 11th or 12th. But either date will do as well. In it he says, "I hav been out of town these three weeks," but Philip Francis, a clerk in the War office, just twenty-nine years of age, writes a letter from London on the 4th of November to his brother-in-law in America. Therefore Philip Francis was not Junius.

BURR.

Hell:

HOW IT IS DEALT WITH GENTLY WHEN DEATH IS AT THE FORE.

With regard to hell, which, rather than heaven, is the chief factor in the method in vogue throughout Christendom for the regeneration of souls, the fears of mortals being more readily excited than their desire, especially when, in the latter case, the thing to be desired is an unknown quantity of unknown quality, except the general claim, without any specifications, that it is everything "to be desired;" whereas, in the case of the former, the thing is of known quantity and quality, the same being an illimitable lake which burneth forever with brimstone, the actual brimstone of commerce, the lake furnishing its own fuel—with regard to hell, with its fire of brimstone, is there a human being who actually believes in such a place? I know very well there are those who profess to believe in the existence of this direful place, and who will stick to it through thick and thin; but 'way down in the bedrock of their hearts do they believe in such a place? There may be here and there an ascetic religionist, without a relativ or friend in the world, who stands alone and apart from all his fellows, who thus believes, and away down to the lowermost soundings of his heart; but, apart from a few such, I don't believe there livs a solitary human being who believes in the hell preached by the truly orthodox of the Christian religion.

What convinces me of this is the surprisingly rapid recovery, in view of the general belief with regard to the hereafter that obtains with Christians, of people of all conditions under the règime of Christianity from the terrible shock they experience when death invades the home circle or the circle of friendship, or strikes down a near and dear one. A few months, at most, and the dearest one, if not forgotten, can hardly be said to be mourned or missed, except as a bread-winner, bread being scarcer than before, and toiled for as never before by non-toilers. Yes, people recover readily from the shock of death when collaterally felt, and become shortly philosophically resigned, and never more anguished mourners than they when the earth closed over the departed ones. Would this be the case if the thought ever came to their minds that hell yawned for the souls of the departed, whom they well know were not up to the regulation line of heavenly purity, or was yawning for said souls when, on the "last day," the sheep and goats shall be divided, each division to go to the pasture prepared for it? Does ever a thought of hell, from the moment when the coffin-lid is screwed down to the day when the mourning habiliments are laid aside, enter the heads of the survivors of those who hav "gone before," and the latter of average mortal morality—this average, we all know, is not high—why?

We all know what are the requirements of the rule of righteousness—that they are too exacting for the great mass of mortals who would fail to catch on, even if they tried, but who make little trial, as they run, knowing they would fail. That irrepressible mouther and pulpit mountebank, Talmage—others of the "cloth," as well—will tell you it is as easy, if not easier, to walk in the strait and narrow path as in the broad-gage road alongside; but we all know that these gospel-sharps tell what is palpably untrue, to draw it mild, the crowded condition of the broad-gage road and the lightly traveled narrow path attesting the falsity of their words. Now, the tide of travel being overwhelmingly great on the one road and correspondingly light on the other, it stands to reason that the greater part of those who die daily are of the broad-gage travelers, booked by the truly orthodox for hell; and to say that this must be patent to the multitude at large is only to allow that their understanding in the matter is as acute as yours or mine, reader, which is not saying much in this particular instance.

Now, this being the case, and the fact being admitted, as it must be, that bereaved ones sooner or later rally from a condition of sorrow most poignant, when shocked by the death of lineals, collaterals, and others, if we are not all collateral, can there then really be in the minds of mortal multitudes any bedrock belief in hell? Were any such belief entertained, would they rally to their normal state, after burying a relativ or friend, as quickly as they now do? Knowing well that their lost ones were not up to the standard required of those entering for the heavenly stakes, would they not be truly and bluely miserable, knowing as well that the departed were plunging about in the lake of fire, or would plunge therein at the conclusion of proceedings on "resurrection day?" There is a diversity of opinion, I notice, among parsons and pietists in general, in regard to the commencement of eternal suffering and bliss, some contending that man at his death, and fresh from his pork-packing establishment, ascends at once to the abodes of bliss or slides down the back flume to the abodes of torment, according as he may be fitted, while others stick for an indefinit period of rest in the grave, and the good old "resurrection day," at last, of the Bible.

How there can be two honest opinions in the matter, when the Bible lays out the program expressly, is something I can't understand. But there are; and among the Protestants the former opinion obtains generally, I think, the Catholics sending their dead to purgatory for a longer or shorter season, where those susceptible to purifying influences are sent on their way rejoicing to meet the "mother of God" when "purified," the obstinate being packed off to interview H.S.M. Satan the First, with no return tickets. This is decidedly the best plan, I think, as a mortal, never so saintly, would prove a very raw recruit, if shunted at death right into heaven among the trained squadrons of angels, and "awkward squads" hardly obtain in the camping-ground of glory. Yes, a polishing-off place for mortals, after death and before glory, is indispensable. Beecher is of this opinion, too, thinking he would find a "sea of mud" in heaven, if the ascension from earth was immediate at death. But the idea prevails generally with Protestants that heaven and hell open their gates to us at death, without any intermediary state, thus back-capping, as it were, the good old "resurrection day" that we could once—alas! not now—bet on. But this is a side issue, so to speak, and I pass it by as of "no consequence," as Toots would say.

All of my readers hav probably attended funerals of relativs and friends whom they knew were not up to that degree of holiness required of aspirants for seats in paradise; knowing they had not been "born again" in the white swaddling clothes of salvation; in short, that they were of the earth earthy, and of morality moral after the fashion of nine hundred and nine-nine per cent of the earth's mortals, which morality falls far short of the heavenly standard. Well, what heard they at the funerals? Did they hear the parson, true to their records as preachers of the "word of God" and gospel of damnation for those who failed to "come to Jesus"—did they hear these preachers say that the souls of the deceased, they were sorry to say—as they should say, as a warning to the living—had gone to hell, there to suffer eternal torments because of their religious shortcomings on earth? Never—never since preaching was invented did a parson at a funeral talk up to his record as a hell-fire preacher! What did they hear? Taffy—taffy on a stick—lengthened taffy long drawn out, and words of a hope-building nature; words, if not supplying kindlings for hopes for the best, then words full of sound and emptiness, and signifying nothing. Yes, they heard the parsons stultify themselvs, and, by word of mouth, in many instances, work the deceased into the realms of bliss in spite of the cast-iron regulations to the contrary, as proclaimed from the pulpit and in the pages of the "Book of Life." This was consoling, I will admit, but all the same it was false to the tenets of orthodox Christians and to the dogmas of their religion.

It is a fact that hell is dealt lightly and gently with by parsons and pietists in general in the presence of death, or at any time when the dead are mentioned. They never hesitate when one of their kind lies low to relegate him or her to a high seat in heaven, but they fight shy of hell, even when a "black sheep" of any of their family circles hies him to that bourne, etc. And the father and mother of the "B. S.," themselvs of the "Lord's anointed," do they believe that this departed one has gone or will go to hell? If they do you can't get them to own up to it, and if they do, how is it that in three months all signs of sorrow hav vanished, and they pursue the even tenor of their way as if nothing had happened? Could a father and mother, losing a wayward son, ever again be happy believing that son to be in hell? Never. Reporters, full of cant, will write, on the death of a pious fraud who givs to the church and cheats the government of duties, that "he died at peace with all the world, his spirit, without a struggle, leaving its tenement of clay for the realms of eternal bliss, there to receive its crown of everlasting glory," etc., etc. On the death of a "Whyo" they will write, . . . "and his guilty soul left its prisonhouse of clay and took up its flight for the place of its abode in the hereafter," or words to that effect, but fighting shy of hell, as he did not of heaven, and as they all do.

To conclude, I must say that I do not believe that even the professed religionists believe in a literal hell of fire and brimstone; if they did, it seems to me, they would all go mad. Yet the Bible says there is such a hell, and they must accept it or throw over the rest of the florid and torrid book. If there is no such hell, then is the Bible false in that particular, and, if falsum in uno, why not falsum in omni, eh? Than this there is no juster maxim in general law. But then perhaps it won't apply to Bible law.

The Illustrations.

It is a striking picture which this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER presents on its first page. Many hav doubtless wondered why there should be a "Methodist Church North," and a "Methodist Church South," any more than a United States North and a United States South. The answer is that there are Methodists in the South who still believe that slavery is a divinely-ordained institution, and others in the North who profess to take an opposit view. Hence the division. The Northern Methodist thinks, "We should unite," and the Southern Methodist declares, "We will unite," but between them rises the ghost of the lost cause—a ghost in the presence of which the Holy Ghost, in whom they profess to be united, loses its adhesiv force.

The memory of the abolition struggle and the record they made cannot be very pleasant to the ministers of the gospel, of whatever denomination, either North or South.

We are glad to be able to resume this week our illustrations of the interesting career of our venerable friend Adam. The two weeks just past, in which no pictures were given on the last page, hav been spent by Mr. Heston in an exhaustiv research into the customs and styles of dress in vogue at the time of which he is treating. It will at once be seen that it is a subject which requires a delicate touch. An anachronism in a religious matter of this sort would be a serious thing. Mr. Heston is now confident that he has formed a true conception of the appearance of Adam on dress parade, as well as of the monkey in the adjacent tree. Eve, of course, proved a still more difficult study to the artist, but we share his belief that her attire was probably as much like the modern Mother Hubbard as anything else now worn. No trouble will be spared in placing Adam and his amiable consort before the world in a way that will do greater justice to their sense of propriety than any representation we hav as yet seen.

A Freethinker's Testimony of No Value.

Mr. Justice Jetté, of Montreal, not long ago decided that the testimony of an Infidel is of no value. The decision was rendered in the case of one W. H. Parker vs. The Bank of Montreal. Mr. Parker's bookkeeper forged Mr. Parker's indorsement to a draft drawn by the bank, and cashed it through another house, which presented it to the bank, where it was paid. As the bookkeeper had the money, Mr. Parker sued to recover the amount. The bank set up in defense a denial of the forgery, and also pleaded that the plaintiff was in fault, besides which an attempt was made in the evidence for the defense to attack the plaintiff's character and show that he acted in bad faith. But the learned judge held that the witness, whose evidence was relied upon to damage the plaintiff's character, was not a competent witness, it being shown that he was a man who did not believe in a future state of rewards and punishments, and the defense was set aside in toto, the judgment holding that the forgery and the bona fides of the plaintiff were completely established.

While we of course know nothing of the real merits of the case, and cannot say whether or not the bank has been defrauded, it is certain that one witness has been injured to the extent of depriving him of a portion of his rights as a citizen. And if he alone knew of facts that would establish the plaintiff's dishonest character, then two parties hav been wronged.

There is no need of any comments upon the iniquity of the law under which this injustice was perpetrated. Every honest man must condemn it because he is honest. Only rascals and power-seeking churchmen can uphold it.

Charles Bradlaugh, M. P.

We get from the National Reformer, Mr. Bradlaugh's paper, the facts in regard to his late reëlection to Parliament. In describing the closing day of the election Mr. Bradlaugh says:

"When I arrived at Northampton I found that a strong notion prevailed that Mr. Richard Turner had managed to secure one of the seats. The only foundation for this notion was the persistent boasting of Mr. Turner, who, for some unknown reason, evidently fully believed in his own success. One of his counting agents, a Mr. Stanton, had the bad taste to come to me soon after I entered the Town Hall and say: 'We hav knocked you out this time, Mr. Bradlaugh.' I bowed and said: 'If so, it cannot be helped; but we will wait till the counting is finished.' The vote was a large one, 8,347, being only 221 less than last year, more than accounted for by removals and deaths. When the piles of votes were assorted it became clear that the straight vote, Labouchere and Bradlaugh, 4,226, showed a clear majority of the whole poll, without reckoning the cross votes, and when the poll was declared the figures stood: Labouchere, 4,570; Bradlaugh, 4,353; Turner, 3,850; Lees, 3,456; so that on the reduced old register I hav gained thirty-eight votes since last year, Mr. Labouchere polling 275 less. The Whig and Tory vote united against me has again proved incapable of taking away my seat, and for the sixth time, and on my ninth election contest, I am once more member for Northampton."

The Reporter, a local paper, has an account of the scene at the counting of the votes. Victors and defeated were there and were expected to address their constituents. They did so, the mayor presiding. "Mr. Bradlaugh," the Reporter says, "was received with tremendous cheering renewed again and again." He made courteous reference to his opponents, and led three rousing cheers for general results. The other candidates spoke temperately with the exception of Mr. Turner, who remarked, referring to Mr. Bradlaugh, that he (Turner) "came forward for the first time to wrest the representation of the town from the greatest and most mischievous demagog of the present century." How the Catholics voted in this election Mr. Bradlaugh is unable to say. A former Roman Catholic bishop sent a telegram as follows:

"For God's sake do not vote for Bradlaugh. Be true to your pledged word, to honor, to Irish patriotism, by disconnecting it from the apostle of blasphemy."

Another eminent Catholic, who apparently had more affection for Ireland than for Rome, spoke as below at a meeting of the Catholic voters. His words refer to Messrs. Bradlaugh and Labouchere:

"Ireland owes a debt of gratitude to both candidates. For years they hav advocated Home Rule for Ireland. To the late junior member we owe a special mark of recognition, because, though he may justly hav considered himself badly treated by the Irish members, yet he never deviated one hair's breadth from the course he had pursued toward the cause of Ireland."

In whatever way the Catholics cast their ballots, the result is the same—Bradlaugh is again an M. P.; and England is in advance of America in having her foremost Freethinker in a position to watch the general legislation of the country.

A Russian Scheme.

Reference was made recently by our Chicago correspondent to the scheme to establish a military post at Chicago. Further information concerning it is given by the daily journals of this city. The project was devised, says the Sun, during the labor troubles in Chicago, and is principally urged by the wealthy employers of that place. The idea is that a few companies of infantry and artillery would overawe or suppress any demonstration of striking workmen, and render the corporations secure in any measures they might inaugurate for their own benefit.

The scheme is a pretty one, but there is one insuperable objection to such employment of Federal troops. It is unconstitutional. Another point is that if this country has come to a condition in which armed force is necessary to keep the populace peaceable, there is something so rotten that society ought to be overhauled and reconstructed. If the republic is a failure, let the political economists devise another social system.

If Congress establishes this post at Chicago, it will be taken by the laboring people as a direct threat, as it is intended, and if they do not promptly retire to private life every government official voting for it they will deserve to wear the chains it forges for their limbs.

Seven Questions.

A young lady reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER residing in Connecticut forwards us a series of seven printed questions, concerning the answers to which she confesses that her ideas are rather vague. The questions were published in the Home Companion, and are credited to "Farrar," presumably Canon Farrar, the English theologian. They are recommended to be sprung upon all Atheists who seek to beguile the believer into a discussion of "side issues." Following are the questions:

1. "Where did matter come from? Can a dead thing create itself?
2. "Where did motion come from?
3. "Where did life come from, save the finger-tip of omnipotence?
4. "Whence came the exquisit order and design in nature? If one told you that millions of printers' types should fortuitously shape themselvs into the 'Divine Comedy' of Dante or the plays of Shakspere, would you not think him a madman?
5. "Whence came consciousness?
6. "Who gave you free will?
7. "Whence came conscience?"

The majority of these questions cannot be answered; but they would be replied to by an Atheist about as follows:

1. We hav no reason to believe that matter ever "came" from anywhere. It is here; we recognize it; and it is impossible to conceive of its absence. Matter exists without any apparent effort on its own part. Its reaction upon itself merely produces change of form. To speak of matter as being created conveys no intelligible conception to the mind; and to ask the Atheist to believe that an inconceivable act proves the existence of a being who performed that act is asking him to abandon his senses altogether. It is safe enough to reply to the second part of the first question that a dead thing probably cannot create itself.

2. Neither can we admit that motion came from anywhere in the sense that it was imparted to matter from something extraneous to matter. Motion is the result of force. A stone possesses weight, which is a form of force. When it is found necessary to push a stone toward the ground to make it fall, or that some sort of propulsion is needed to impart a downward motion to a brook upon the side of a hill, it may then be pertinent to inquire where that motion is to come from. To ask, "Where did motion come from?" is to ask where form, dimension, or weight came from. They are inseparable from matter, and since matter "came from" nowhere, but apparently has always existed, these attributes of matter are coeternal with it, and it is idle to ask their origin.

3. In the absence of all reliable data on the subject, this question cannot be answered with certainty. Perhaps life, like form, is one of the inseparable attributes of matter. There are those who deny that any matter is "dead." We do not know. The theory that life emanated from the "finger-tip of omnipotence" is altogether unsupported by evidence. Nothing analogous to that process has been remarked by science.

4. Here the question of design in nature is raised, and illustrated by an example in typography. This is confounding two very distinct domains—nature and art. It is as inaccurate an expression as would be the statement that a man who was hanged had died a natural death. We see in nature no evidence of design, but only a long and slow process of adaptation. To attribute design to an all-powerful being is to deny his omnipotence. Men design and devise ways and means in order to bring about a certain result. If the result could be achieved without the design, then designing would be unnecessary. For instance, could Dante hav impressed his "Divine Comedy" upon the reader's mind without the use of types, he would hav done so and Canon Farrar could not hav used that illustration. With the deity it is supposed to be different. He, it is believed, has merely to will a thing and that thing is done, and designing the means when no means are necessary would be an act inconsistent with the notion of omniscience. In seeking to prove design in nature the theologian should be honest enough to go to nature for an example. When such a theory can be established by that method, the design argument will be worth considering as pointing to the existence of a universal designer.

5. This question as understood is practically the same as the third.

6. Free will has not been given us. The notion of free will is a theological conception designed to deceive men into the belief that the absurd is reasonable if they only choose to think so. In that way responsibility for belief or disbelief was thrown upon each person, and God was relieved from the inconsistency of creating imperfect beings and then damning them for not being perfect. Men hav no more power to control their belief than they hav to control the natural color of their hair. Let anyone who thinks that the will is free try and believe that the ink which THE TRUTH SEEKER is printed in is red and that the paper is black.

7. Conscience came with experience. Men learned that certain things had bad results. To do those things was wrong. Other acts had good results. To do these was right. Out of the distinction between right and wrong grew the conscience as a sort of monitor. That conscience is not a gift from a single being is shown by the fact that what would strike one person's conscience as wrong would seem praiseworthy or at least innocent to another. It is the result of education and experience.

These conclusions, the Atheist will say, if we hav not misrepresented him, are merely tentativ and are subject to addition or modification. They are not dogmas with penalties attached for disbelief. They leave unobstructed the highway of systematic investigation. Dogmatic belief in a God, to be placed behind every mystery as an explanation of phenomena, on the other hand, puts an end to research, and opens wide the door for the admission of all kinds of superstitions. The universe is governed by law, and until that fact is realized there is no sure abiding-place for truth.

Why We Hear of Anarchy and Communism.

It is not reasonable to suppose that in this country or any other there would exist a large number of intelligent men advocating a system of governmental relations different from those at present prevailing, if the systems which we hav fulfilled all the requirements they are called upon to meet. Nothing exists without a reason, and, therefore, it is a great deal more philosophical, in the presence of these new notions, to hear what their exponents hav to say than it is to go on deluding ourselvs with the belief that ours is the only perfect form of government possible, and answering all objections by saying that if it does not accord with the needs of human existence so much the worse for human needs.

The people of the United States are called upon to face the fact that our democratic-republican form of government is under heavy criticism; and the attack is not from the monarchical systems left behind, nor from any modification of them upon the flank. The government is in no danger of violent overthrow, but it is to be tested as to its capacity to keep upon the even tenor of its way despite all allurements and all obstacles that may be thrown in its path. It must stand the test of a sort of civil service examination, and show its superiority over all others. And its competitors cannot be regarded altogether with contempt.

Among these rivals probably the most seductiv is Communism—since it claims to be only republicanism realized in its ultimate and most beneficent form, as witness the arguments laid down in the book, "Rational Communism." It has a well-defined ideal, and leaves not an i undotted, nor a t uncrossed. It is the collectiv aspect of Pantarchy, in which the harmony of the spheres is destined to pervade the relations of men. All this, its advocates claim, is to be brought about through a more perfect but less complex system of government.

On the other hand we hav Anarchism—and Anarchism as here used is not necessarily suggestiv of dynamite. It is a philosophy, albeit one which, it seems to us, would hav men blow out the light which they hav, and grope blindly in the dark after something better. Anarchism says, "Away with law." The justification for this cry is found in our many bad laws. "Away with the rights of society," it goes on. And society claims so many dictatorial rights that the mandate is not without reason. "Giv us," adds Anarchism, "free speech, free mails, a free press;" and then it appends "free rum," and "free love," and straddles around vaguely upon the verge of the precipice over which liberty falls into license. Anarchism lacks the precision of Communism; it exceeds even republicanism in its uncertainty.

Such are the two competitors which our government has to face. Between them there are a host of other isms, but they are mere branchings off from one or the other of these. And yet if the true theory of democracy had ever been realized, it may be doubted if Communism or Anarchism would hav been heard of. The founders of the republic had ideas of government which hav not been carried out by their successors. To see how far we are from those ideas it is only necessary to read the Declaration and the Constitution, and contrast the principles therein laid down with the laws upon our statute books. Contrast the first amendment, for example, with the rulings of our courts imposing disabilities upon Atheists, exempting church property from taxation, and providing for religious instruction in schools. Take the provision in the Constitution relating to post-roads and see if in it a justification can be found for the existence of the Comstock laws establishing a censorship of press and mails. Carry the comparison into all its details, observe the abuses that hav grown out of these precedents, how the construction of good laws differs from their intent, and how the number of bad laws grows with every year—and the presence of Communism and Anarchism is explained. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch sees this very clearly. "The laws of this country," it says, "recognize no privileged classes, and the administrators that do so are making mischief. Whenever it becomes apparent that our penal laws are to be enforced only against the poor and weak, and that the rich or influential are to be made a law unto themselvs, the harvest of Anarchy will soon ripen and armed mobs will spring up from the dragon's teeth which the favored few will hav sown."

The fact which the Post-Dispatch calls attention to seems to hav become apparent to a few, with the results which it expected. The remedy should be as apparent as the evil: We hav laws that may be called sumptuary; we hav religious laws; we hav laws that invade the freedom of the citizen. These laws, too, are the very ones which corrupt courts seem to most delight in enforcing. They should be repealed. This done, and with a return to something like democratic government, it is an interesting question whether Communism and Anarchism would be left a peg whereon their orators might hang their hats. The matter would be settled if our legislators realized the duties imposed upon them by virtue of their election to office.

THEY hav something worse than Anarchy in Cincinnati. A dispatch from that city describes "one of the most remarkable religious manias of which there is any record." A party of thirty or forty people, most of them prominent and alleged to be above the average in intelligence, believe that Mrs. John P. Martin, of Walnut Hills, is Christ manifest in the flesh, and that her sister, Mrs. John F. Brook, is the Holy Ghost. The followers of these two women, it is said, meet at Mrs. Brook's house and worship them both. The account says:

"Mrs. Martin has exerted some strange and wonderful influence that has put them completely in her power, and they are fanatics on the subject. One of the followers of this woman-Christ is named Jerome. He was a bookkeeper here for the Cincinnati agency of D. Appleton and Co., the New York publishers. He gave up his position of $1,800 a year to serve the female savior of mankind. To an Enquirer reporter he said in an earnest and eloquent conversation, 'I hav seen God face to face in the last half-hour.' A young man named Cook, who works in the auditor's office of the Adams Express Company, has also been captured. He resigned his position, and has attached himself to the new sect. They believe that all churches are frauds, and the preachers a set of fools."

Accounting for the fact that Christ should manifest himself in a female, they say that in heaven there are no sexes, and the savior is as likely to appear in a woman as in a man, which is doubtless true. Mrs. Martin, the "New Christ," and Mrs. Brook, the "Holy Ghost," they say are the only two perfect women on earth, and the millennium is at hand. This movement has been going on for a year. The women seclude themselvs, and will not be seen by anyone who is not a worshiper, or vouched for by one of them. Many hav sold their homes and taken houses near the woman on the hill. Those who hav given up their positions say they do not need work or money. All they need is spiritual food, and this will be furnished by the Lord, just as it was furnished to the children in the wilderness. A Miss Andrews, says the report, who livs with her mother on Walnut Hills, is almost insane from excitement, and passes her whole time in weeping, singing, and praying. Her mother has tried to show her the folly of her belief, but in vain. There is material in all this business for some first-class religious immorality. It is safe to predict that it will not be long before those who listen attentivly will hear something drop.

WE print in another part of this issue two communications touching the recent lamentable affair at Liberal, Mo. They present both sides of the matter. A large number of other communications on the same subject are at hand, but we can not undertake to print them. Liberals are not so much interested in the details as in the principle involved. All the information received leaves the facts substantially as stated in our issue of July 17th. The only statement objected to is our casual remark that there are in Liberal "a handful who hold broad doctrins on the subject of love and marriage, and who are vociferous in airing their opinions in season and out." The truth of this is denied, but the objection is immaterial. Whether the handful are vociferous or not, there seems to hav been no excuse for violent demonstrations against them. What Liberals at large most desire, we take it, is not so much an explanation of the affair as a comforting assurance from those having influence in the town of Liberal that they will use their endeavors not to hav such a thing occur again. Perhaps a little self-sacrifice on both sides would be admissible for the sake of peace. Firearms cannot make a comfortable pillow even for a freelover.

THE Rev. Mr. Munhall, a howling revivalist now holding forth in Denver, Col., got off the following last week:

"Infidelity is a humbug, an owl in the daylight. All Infidels know some one who demonstrates the truths he professes. Infidelity is doing nothing but trying to tear down. I hav no hesitation in saying that he who tries to destroy my faith is my enemy.

"I'm not given to mentioning the name of the Jumbo Infidel, but sometimes I get so warmed up I can't help it. . . . I knew a case of starving at Shelbyville, where 518 Methodist preachers lent a hand, but Bob Ingersoll never sent a cent. He makes money by making Infidels, but he doesn't help the poor. The charitable institutions of the country are kept up by Christians. Infidels don't do anything. All they hav ever done is to build a monument to Tom Paine at Boston. Infidelity can accomplish nothing."

If the Rev. Mr. Munhall is not aware that he is guilty of downright lying, some one who enjoys his confidence should take the trouble to apprise him of that fact.

MR. SAMUEL N. EWING, of Minneapolis, Minn., has sent out a printed address to the Congress of the United States in which he calls upon the government to issue a request to all the other governments of the world and dignitaries of the various churches and ecclesiastical societies, including the pope, to meet in Washington on the 1st of October, 1886, to "consider the practicability of returning to the worship of one God, the ruler of the universe, at the earliest practicable moment." Mr. Ewing says that he is prepared to prove on short notice that the Bible is not inspired, that there is no such thing as original sin, and that Christ was not the son of God. Perhaps Mr. Ewing's scheme will never be realized, but it is evident that he has a firm grasp on some fundamental truths.

IT is learned with regret that Mr. B. C. Murray, editor of the Denison, Texas, Gazetteer, has been the victim of a brutal assault at the hands of a county official, who traveled ten miles for the purpose of knocking him down and jumping in his face. The trouble arose from something of a political nature which had appeared in the Gazetteer. Brother Murray reports that there is enough of him left to conduct a meritorious family newspaper. It would be of value to know if the official in question is the sort of brutes Grayson county is in the habit of electing to fill its public offices.

THE March number of Progress, a Freethought monthly published in London, G. W. Foote editor, cannot in any sense be termed dry reading. Since the 14th of last March it has been lying at the bottom of the Atlantic, just outside New York harbor, in the hold of the ocean steamer Oregon, and is about as wet as water could make it. Last week the divers blew out the side of the sunken vessel, liberating a large amount of mail matter, and on Thursday the magazine was duly and moistly delivered at this office.

"AN article is going the rounds of the religious and secular papers to the effect that Voltaire behaved very disgracefully at one of Paganini's concerts. There is no truth in it. Paganini was not born until six years after Voltaire died, i.e., Voltaire died May 30, 1778, and Paganini was born in 1784. This shows how easy it is for some papers to injure those they do not like. Honest people may learn the motiv of such papers." So writes Mr. J. K. Dearth, of South Lowell, Alabama.

IF any method in vogue for "popularizing Secularism" deserves support and therefore success, it is that of C. B. Reynolds and his Tent. Mr. Reynolds might be called a Freethought evangelist, and he is working with an ardor and persistency that should be appreciated and rewarded. He depends largely upon general subscription to make his Tent effort possible in localities where it is not self-sustainiug, so that those who cannot giv him a call should feel no hesitancy about giving him a lift.

W. F. JAMIESON has been in correspondence with the chairman of the Secular Union for Montana and other parties with reference to permanent lecture work, the desire having been expressed to hav something more than a flying lecture trip. Mr. Jamieson has already started for Montana, and will open the campaign by lecturing on the way. To this end he invites the Liberals of Montana desiring lectures in their towns to write to him at once, addressing him at Wentworth, Dakota, and the letters will overtake him at his lecture points on the route. He authorizes the Liberals of Montana to challenge the clergy for debate.

Letters from Friends.

SYLVANIA, O., July 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Having read the scriptures for sixty years, and preached from them for half that time, I now offer as a premium $100 to the Bible student who proves from it that man has an immortal soul as an entity while living (more than other animals), or that exists in an intermediate state after death.

The Bible implies that the soul and the body are one organism; that both die together; that all animals hav souls as well as men.

Nephesh, the Hebrew word translated "living soul" in Gen. ii, 7, is used four times for the animals before Adam was thought of. Why more relevant in his case than theirs?

S. M. JUDSON.

PORTLAND, July 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am a devoted reader of your valuable paper, and get it here from Mr. Wilcox, the stationer. I am following your arguments and am delighted with them. But to mistakes everybody is subject. Hoping that you will bear me no malice, I'll take the liberty to correct you in one instance. I am alluding to that "Fish Story." You say (for short) science knows sixty-five species of whales, and none of them has a throat big enough to swallow a good-sized herring. How was it possible for the whale to swallow the man Jonah? Here, Mr. Editor, is where you are not fully posted. You will remember Jonah was a Jew, and experience teaches us that this class of people are slick enough to squeeze through almost anywhere.

Respectfully, MILTON PERCIVAL MAROUS.

GRAND MOUND, IOWA, July 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In replying to your Anarchistic friends, Messrs. Appleton and Tucker, you say, "Civil government givs us a stable currency in place of wild-cat issues by irresponsible parties." Now, if this is a true statement, I, for one, am very anxious to know it, and if it is not true, you, I am quite sure, will concede at once that it never should hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Hence it devolves upon you to prove your position—giv us the facts and records upon which you base your statement. C. DUTTON.

[We fear Brother Dutton is not as anxious to see the truth of our statement demonstrated as he is to develop some financial theory of his own. We believe that, as the word stable is understood, our statement is true, and the proof of it is that a dollar has been legal tender for one hundred cents ever since the first one was coined.—ED. T. S.]

MCCUNE, July 5, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I ask to speak to many Liberal friends through THE TRUTH SEEKER. We celebrated the glorious Fourth here on the third, and had a big crowd, the largest in this part of the county. I was honored with being made president of the day. We hav a host of Liberals in McCune. Most of our business men think for themselvs. We hav three churches, but no Liberal could get room to lecture in them. We hav a fine Opera House about finished, owned by an outspoken Liberal. We expect to hav lectures here next winter. There are two papers printed in McCune, one by a Liberal.

I think the pictures splendid, especially "On the road to the Poor-house" and "At rest in Abe's bosom." Some say the Christians don't like them. Let them squirm; it will do them good. Set them thinking; then they will learn something.

M. S. GOWIN.

BRONSON, MICH., July 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I send $2 for the Campaign Fund, to enable Mr. Putnam to continue proclaiming the gospel of Freethought; $1 contribution for Mr. Reynolds's best, if not "greatest, show on earth," and $1 toward sustaining you in printing "the way to salvation" by means of the illustrations.

Most of the cartoons are excellent. There is open to the tender foot a very simple mode of escape from the "dreadful caricatures," and that is to take a pair of shears, and cut out the offending "pictcrs," and then "read the holes." But, I think, many would afterward manifest a curiosity to see the clipped cuts, as did the lady who, after her prudent husband had in this manner carefully expurgated the family newspaper, straightway proceeded to procure an uncut copy, and, by placing it underneath the clipped one, could thoughtfully peruse the mischievous items, without taking time to devour the entire sheet. Although it is now a novelty, your readers' eyes will soon become accustomed to the innovation, and should you ever publish an issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER sans cuts, we presume some of those now complaining the loudest would be among the first to cry, "Pray giv us back the object lessons!"

J. FRANCIS RUGGLES.

NEWBURGH, O., July 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find the wherewith to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER (cartoons included) to my address.

For myself, individually, I do not need the cartoons to assist me in placing the Bible where it belongs, for I did that long ago. I like to look at pictures, and I understand their power to educate. I want all who need them to hav them, and I congratulate Watson Heston on his ability to place the Bible and its saints in their true light before the people.

I hav read of the condition of affairs in Liberal, Mo., in the last TRUTH SEEKER, and am grieved that the people of that place are conducting themselvs so ill-Liberally. H. P. Replogle's statement, "There are not more than a dozen persons in the town who understand or care anything about the sex question," tells why there is such commotion there on the subject. Ignorance and persecution go hand in hand, and, in my opinion, it is a disgrace to the town that so few of her people "understand or care anything about the sex question." Being the important question, underlying all others, it is the duty of all, Liberals especially, to understand the question in all its bearings, that they may act wisely and well in regard to it

Yours for free thought on all subjects, and free acts, so long as individual rights are respected,

ANNIE EDWARDS KIRK.

SMITH'S MILL, MINN., July 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It may interest your readers to know that even so far in the rural districts as we are situated Freethought is not a stranger among us. The germ is rapidly developing even here. Through the efforts of our enterprising agent, H. S. Votaw, the people of Smith's Mill were treated to the first Freethought lecture delivered here, Sunday, July 4th. The speaker, Mr. Edwin C. Walker, of Valley Falls, Kansas, was introduced by Mr. Votaw. His lecture on "Some of the Mistakes of Christians" was well received by the audience, in which the thinking portion of our town was represented. Mr. Walker is an able speaker and is doing much for our cause, not only in that capacity, but as editor of Lucifer, and agent for almost everything in the line of Freethought literature.

The citizens of Janesville and vicinity, including Smith's Mill, hav raised money to defray the expenses of a course of lectures to be delivered in the near future by Mr. Remsburg. Then we may expect a "feast of reason" indeed. I am confident it cannot pass without emancipating some mind from the shackles of superstition. In regard to your highly valued paper, I will say, although my husband has but recently subscribed for it, we already regard it as indispensable. As to the pictures, while they occupy scarcely a page, they speak volumes. Keep on in the good way.

MRS. JESSIE CROW.

BROOKTON, ME., July 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav enjoyed the privilege of an occasional perusal of your excellent paper for the last three years, but only lately hav become a subscriber. I first saw it at the house of a friend, and was with difficulty induced to take it up and read it. Being a "good Catholic," I thought that the Lord would strike me dead or the priest turn me into an ox if I touched it. Although not at first convinced, I began thinking for myself from that day, and the result is that my mind has been thoroughly disabused of the errors and pretensions of orthodoxy. I received the "Age of Reason," the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and "Conventional Lies" from your office and read them with pleasure and profit. Lack of means only prevents me from purchasing all of your excellent publications. I enjoy your well-written and pungent articles and the cutting sarcasm of your illustrations, but would say here, without wishing to be at all critical, that I think they may giv unnecessary offense to some good people and thereby injure the cause they are intended to benefit. I was amused the other day to hear a fellow misinterpret your title, calling it the "Snake-Killer," but it struck me upon reflection that the name is quite correct, and my earnest wish is that you may continue killing the snakes of ecclesiastical bigotry and superstition. I hav a brother who is a Freethinker like myself, and takes great interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

MR. EDITOR: Christians frequently claim that church-membership has increased wonderfully since the year 1800; that in that year there was one communicant in fifteen, and now there is one in every five of the population. I think they overestimate the number at the present time, but, suppose they are correct, under the circumstances they hav but little so boast of. During that period the clergy hav been especially successful in taking in women and children, and now I believe three-fourths of all white church-members are of this class. But their greatest conquests hav been among the negroes. Our colored "brudderen and sisteren" take as naturally to religion as ducks take to water; their credulity is wonderful; they hav had no opportunities for improving their minds. Previous to the abolition of slavery the church did not consider them human beings. Now they are the church, "And of such is the kingdom of heaven"—excuse my Latin. These people hav so far advanced toward civilization as to be in full fellowship, and on the same intellectual plane, with the average white orthodox Christian. From this source alone church-membership has been doubled. Then what shall we say of the Liberal Christians, the Unitarians, Universalists, and others, who are now all counted? Surely the church will soon be greedy enough to claim everybody, irrespectiv of religion or politics. They hav not done as well as they should with all these favorable conditions.

I am a little disappointed to see that Professor Bell is opposing Prohibition. I think he is making a mistake. Prohibition has come to stay, and is reasonably successful in Kansas, except in the large cities. It is perfectly consistent with Liberalism, and is championed by many of the best Liberals. We need Professor Bell with his masterly logic and polished oratory in the Liberal field.

Let me suggest to Freethinkers everywhere that they act as correspondents of their local papers, touching questions of general interest, and not forgetting to plead the cause of our public schools. People are willing to listen to common sense if properly presented in moderate doses. I think it is generally best to sign fictitious names to such correspondence, because then your statements will be taken for what they are worth, and will stand on their merits.

Many Liberals are in the habit of giving money to the churches. This is very unwise, and generally is inexcusable. With this money they send missionaries to Kansas, and other Western states, to corrupt our people. Each of the three preachers in this town receives money regularly from some mission fund in the East. I know an emissary of orthodoxy now working in western Kansas who is supported entirely by his "salary" from the American Home Mission. Brother Liberals hear, our prayer. When the church sends its women to you for money, refuse them. Turn a deaf ear, O friends, to their entreaties. Tell them you cannot conscientiously giv your money to a cause in which you do not believe. Tell them that those who use the article must pay for it. On such an occasion think of us poor sinners in the West who implore you to stand by us. We beseech you, do not with your money force upon us these nefarious superstitions. Be consistent. Be men. Send your money immediately to the Liberal Campaign Fund if you cannot resist the wiles of the church beggar. Then great shall be your peace of mind, and the satisfaction of having done your duty.

A. T. MCMILLAN.

ORANGE, N. J., July 20, 1886.

DEAR READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Look up a back number, July 17th, and on the first page notice that distracted son of Adam on his knees. That picture represents ME in a most truthful and impressiv manner. I was bred a Presbyterian, born in a Presbyterian bed, rocked in a Presbyterian cradle, educated a Presbyterian, and hav been stoker, usher, bell-ringer, precentor, trustee, clerk, treasurer, deacon, Bible-reader, sermon-reader, leader of prayer-meetings, Sunday-school superintendent, and the principal factotum of a Presbyterian church for more than twenty years, so that I understand and fully appreciate every item in the cartoon on the first page. As soon as I saw that picture I said, "How true to life in my case!" I laughed and laughed, and continued to laugh until everyone near me came to see what under the "canopy" could induce me to laugh so heartily, when they all laughed and laughed until we could not laugh any more. Then I woke up at night and went to laughing, and I laughed until I had laughed myself to sleep. I couldn't help laughing, as that picture is so impressiv, representing the stupid and nonsensical practices of the church in such a striking manner that I exclaimed, again and again, "How true in my own experience in the church!" Mr. Heston is a genius. Let him have all the latitude and longitude he wants by way of designing pictures. That single cartoon tells a more impressiv story concerning the stupid dogmas of the church than pages without number of printed matter.

Those pills! Ha, ha, ha! Let me interpolate a hearty laugh here. That stupid doctrin of total depravity is beautifully represented by a huge pill. The same is true of all the other doctrins. I understand them all, clear to the very bottom of their stupidity. They all signify:

"You can and you can't, you will and you won't, You'll be damned if you do, and be damned if you don't."

Do not entertain the idea for a moment of discontinuing those impressiv cartoons. Every time I read any objection to the pictures, I say, That objector is lacking in certain essential elements that go to make a perfect man or woman. Let us giv three rousing cheers for Heston. ESS. E. TEE.

NEW YORK CITY, July 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It is with pleasure I reply to Mr. Hopkins re the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, declaring this country to be "essentially, lawfully, and by proclamation christian" (little c, please). I am sorry I surprised him. I hav lived on this earth about twenty-seven years, and as I hav no recollection of living prior, I do not think or expect to liv in another. Still, I hav lived long enough to be surprised at nothing. I beg to refer Mr. Hopkins to the celebrated Girard trial, and loads of others "too numerous to mention." I might giv him a summary of this trial, but your space is too valuable to admit of it, but should he desire it I will cheerfully write to him personally. Outside of all this, the presence of that immoral work of fiction called the holy Bible in our law-courts, and slobbered on by our presidents, those taking oaths of office, etc., to test the veracity of witnesses, is, I think, a sufficient proof of my assertion, but the excuse, if one can be made for this gross violation of the Constitution, is that "this country inherited the common law of Great Britain, and was therefore Christian." It is so seldom that I intrude upon your valuable space that I hope I will not rob you by adding to this a few personal remarks. I hav been your constant reader for over four years, but, bred and reared in the Christian religion, I might hav been a slave to its farcical doctrins yet had not I become in some mysterious way acquainted with that venerable champion of Freethought, Mr. George Davenport, of this city, who cast the chains asunder; and when I contemplate the feelings of the slave on his emancipation, I cannot even compare that with the emancipation of the mind. He is a noble man. May his stay with us be long; we cannot afford to lose such missionaries to our cause.

Keep up the pictures; they are all right. I believe in them, and it is my honest opinion that cartoons are of great value. I am of opinion that Puck's cartoons did more harm to Jim Blaine than the three R's.

I hope I hav not intruded on your valuable space too much. I will not trouble you again for three months, unless you hav to hav the kindness to insert an obituary notice of and for me.

THOMAS ROGERS.

PALATKA, FLA., July 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The women folks having called upon me to assist them in making a selection from the "mottoes for Freethinkers," as advertised in your paper, I find myself, after looking over them, in a real fault-finding frame of mind, and hav determined that you shall hav the benefit (?) of my criticism.

Taken in the order in which they occur in the advertisment, the first one expresses literally (whatever it may be made to express under "spiritual" license, a doctrin no genuin Liberal can subscribe to), the "living" hav the right only for each to control himself. The second is vague and only partly true. Freethought, doubtless, is a great helper in the search for truth, but surely no one will say it necessarily givs it to us. In the third the cart is plainly before the horse—so far as either position has any unison with fact. Superstition is the child wholly of Ignorance, and has but the one parent, a hermaphrodite at that, and may be either mother or father to slavery; but its child—never, only in an illegitimate way; and as we are to hav only "mental" liberty, illegitimacy is fatal to the claim of ma- or *pa-*ternity. The fourth utters a philosophical fact without circumlocution, and is, therefore, good. The fifth is good enough for those it may suit. The sixth I hav always looked upon as Grundy sop. Remove its center, its heart, and then full-fledged Liberals can adopt it as a motto. Seventh, "now" and "here" are very good places in which "to be happy," but some of us hav been happy heretofore (yesterday), and a few hav a hope of a little hereafter (to-morrow, for instance). Eighth, a wise enough injunction, but doubtless dressed to please the children. Ninth, cannot be excelled, and should adorn the walls of every parlor and habitable room on the planet, and be pasted in the crown of every hat large enough to be worn by Helen Gardener's theological students.

Send us the fourth, fifth, and ninth, the only ones of the lot really worth, as we see it, the room they will occupy on the wall.

Success to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. While not exactly in the van, it is doing a glorious work, and is doubtless evoluting as rapidly as is consistent with robust health.

LEWIS MORRIS.

NEW ZEALAND, June 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The specimen copies I sent for came duly to hand. Thanks. Since then I ordered through a news-agent here regular copies to be sent for one year. Those cartoons speak volumes at a glance. They will reach the mind of many where reading would not, and thus afford matter of interest to a wider variety of minds. "Liberty in Danger" is, I think, a little overdone—at least, we in New Zealand do not anticipate the danger indicated in that cut; but perhaps it is meant to illustrate the past more than the present or future. The last one on the same number, "An Apparition of the Virgin," is as complete an exposition of church history as could well be imagined, the best epitome of ecclesiastical stratagem and subtlety extant. A March number is just to hand. "A Clerical Surprise-Party" is, I think, grand. Your artist is a genius of the first water. His subjects are highly creditable to himself and THE TRUTH SEEKER. The humor and satire in this picture are, I should say, perfection. The peculiarly happy method here depicted of turning the tables on the enemy is, while amusing, yet wonderfully cutting. The numbers for March 20th and April 10th are both remarkably good; nothing could be more appropriate. Long may Mr. Heston flourish.

The reading matter of your journal is varied, and Freethinkers of all shades will find in your columns food for thought. Every Liberal will view with satisfaction the fair field you allow to all—Materialist, Spiritualist, and Socialist. And I hav no doubt our orthodox friends would also find THE TRUTH SEEKER quite as Liberal with them as with those of, so to speak, its own household. This is as it should be (or else, Mr. Editor, you would be clannish and partial), provided always that contributions and opinions are couched in suitable language.

Perhaps a few lines respecting our position as Freethinkers in this distant colony may be of interest to some of your readers. Loooking at our position broadly, I think we hav made fair progress. Of course we hav a goodly number of "devil-dodgers" to contend with, but even these show a disposition to be more tolerant and liberal than of old. We hav quite a number of Freethought Associations in the centers of population. Attempts hav been made to support a Freethought organ, but without lasting success. Our last effort in this direction was the Freethought Review, published at Wanganni, on the North Island. This was a capital little paper of sixteen pages, moderate and tolerant in its tone, well got up—in fact, would not disgrace the editorial sanctum of the New York Herald or London Times. I am quite sure THE TRUTH SEEKER would welcome it as a bosom friend. But, alas! it is dead, to our lasting disgrace. This want of effort or milk-and-water spirit of Liberalism is a stain on our cause in New Zealand. We hav the numbers, but not the vitality that makes for success. When one thinks of the many privileges and advantages we enjoy—means of communication, the right to think, and the right to say what we think—those of us who, out of their abundance, will not step out of our path to promote and help along a cause either by word, pen, or purse, are worse than the brutes. They at least only prey on each other from necessity; man too often for pleasure. The open enemies that we fight against we can respect; they, too, are fighting for a cause they believe to be right. But your milksop of a Freethinker, the man who says, "I'm not concerned either way," is credit to neither God nor devil. "I would ye were hot or cold, but since ye are lukewarm I will spew you out of my mouth." I can respect the man that said that, Infidel though I am. That man was in earnest, he was sincere; hence he was honest.

Our leading members of the government are pronounced Aguostics (with the exception of the colouial treasurer), the premier avowedly so before his election. Our schools are purely secular, and rightly so. I trust they may continue so; for when eveu the men who compose the various governments of the world hold such diametrically opposit opinions on matters of conscience, I think it high time that those governments having any pretensions to civilization dropped the recognition of religion and a state church. (Query: Why not a state God?) This is a question purely for private judgment; it is at best only a matter of opinion. Let ministers, parents, Sunday-schools of the various denominations, take this subject under their special care. Governments are no more fit to say what God shall be worshiped than is a wild Indian. True, there are some people who do not hesitate to inform us that they are on very intimate terms with their God, and actually take it upon themselvs to advise him. Advise almighty God!

There is, too, a class of "sky-pilots" who think it no shame to dip their hands in the tax-payer's pocket in aid of this almighty God. For my part, I am quite willing for all and sundry to hav a God; nay, more, so long as they support their own God, and keep their hand from the tax-payer's chest, I will to the best of my ability help them in maintaining their right to worship all or any Gods that they feel it their duty to worship, provided always that that duty does not infringe on the rights of those who do not feel worship a duty or necessity. To a certain extent—that is, if we are Liberal—we should sympathize with the individual who owns a God, much in the same spirit that we sympathize with our children with their toys and youthful sports—it interests them and does not hurt us.

But, apart from this, I agree with numbers of your readers that it is altogether out of place for any government to take upon itself the responsibility of setting up a state God or state church. It is a gross injustice to those whose imagination is not sufficiently fertil to enable them to set up an ideal future world or God. For a government to do this is only setting up a modern brazen serpent to bewilder thought, and tamper with the right of private judgment. On the other hand, if individuals choose to organize and build churches for the purpose of giving vent to their surcharged feelings and sentiments, why, let them, by all means. "The fear of hell is a hangman's whip, to keep the wretch in order," etc. I know very many people who feel it to be a conscientious duty to periodically worship. I can feel for them, and I can respect them. On the other hand, again, there are vast numbers of worthy and respected men and women who are humanitarians in the best sense of the word, but who cannot worship. Which, then, shall a government do—compel the former not to worship, or the latter to support what they do not believe in? Of course a Liberal government will say, "It is a question that we must not, and that we dare not, deal with."

Referring again to your paper, I trust you will continue the pictures. They can be obnoxious to only the bigoted Liberal. The man who tells you that he will cease taking your paper if these cartoons are continued is virtually saying, "Uuless you think as I do, you are wrong." The pictures are certainly free from immorality. To the Liberal Freethinker, blasphemy is a word without meaning. So let us hav the pictures.

You hav some capital stories in the "Corner." "John Toogood," March 24th, givs us food for thought. "A Huge Joke" affords us a good lessou on selfishness. Your Correspondence columns will draw minds together and enable kindred hearts to exchange an idea or mental grasp of the hand with those they will never meet. T. HARWOOD.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., July 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Long live THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your inflated, hook-nosed Adam in last week's issue amused me very much. I shall call and subscribe before I return to Oregon.

Please excuse a stranger for intruding on your space, for I do not really feel a stranger to that knowledge of the error of religious superstition which places all lovers of right and truth on a footing of good fellowship. G. L. BURGESS.

MILWAUKEE, OR., July 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 19th is a communication from Colonel Kelso, in which he seems to think he has found a solution of the Prohibition problem so plain that all Infidel Prohibitionists ought at once to take the other side. Now, there is no man in whose company I would rather find myself than in his. However, reformers cannot always select their company, and in this movement, when one finds himself traveling with the whisky-dealers on one road and with the Women's Christian Temperance Union on the other, he feels like taking to the woods.

Of course, each Infidel will determin his position by the facts and logic of the case, as he understands them. Brother Kelso says: "Our Prohibition friends correctly contend that, so long as ardent spirits are imported into the United States or manufactured and sold therein, certain persons will be injured by the excessiv use of them."

I do not think that is our position at all. We contend and profess to know that alcohol is a poison. Our position is not that it injures "certain persons," but all persons who use it; not that its excessiv use is injurious, but that its use is injurious. We do not admit that it is properly a "drink" or a food. Water is the only drink, and alcohol resembles water only in the irrelevant fact of its being a fluid. We do not admit that, as a general proposition, alcohol is good, and that only some incidental evil comes from it, but affirm that it is bad, and question even the incidental good which it is said to produce. I am rather green in this business, having had only about thirty years' experience as a Prohibitionist, but my impressiou is that Brother Kelso has not succeeded in stating our position, but in misstating it.

He says: "All this, however, is equally true of money. Indeed, far more evil results from love of money than love of drink." I do not think any serious evil ever resulted from love of either. A person might love alcohol ever so much, and it would not hurt him if it did not get into his stomach or brains. And right here is the philosophy of Prohibition. We can neither reconstruct the human stomach and nerves so they will withstand the effect of alcohol, nor take away the perverted appetite, which in many cases is inherited, and will be transmitted to posterity. The only practical thing we can try to do is to get the stuff out of the way. It is a matter of regret to me that I was not endowed with more of the love of money, instead of taking little thought for the morrow. I should not now be in poverty, and would be of more use in the world. But I did not acquire an appetite for ardent spirits, and am glad I didn't. Does Brother Kelso really think money a greater evil than ardent spirits, and of two evils is he willing to choose the least? How would he like to hav his pension commuted from mouey to commissary whisky?

Would he not like to hav thousands of dollars to distribute among the poor or to compensate them for houest toil? Would he like to possess large quantities of ardent spirits for the same purpose? Does he think the saloon-keeper who takes the greater evil, money, from the toiler and givs him the lesser evil, whisky, and thus deprives his family of food and clothes, is a luminous example of benevolcuce? "Why not, then, prohibit the use of money as well as drink" (whisky)? Because mouey is a nice thing to hav and to use, but whisky is not. It is a good thing, takeu in moderation, even for women and children. The art of acquiring and using it properly is an education. Not so ardent spirits. The best thing to do with them is to let them aloue.

"So of women. Why not prohibit them? . . . If prohibition be good in one of these cases, why not in the other? Let us be consistent."

The cases are not exactly alike. Women coustitute more than half of mankind, and to exterminate them is to destroy the human race. To extirpate alcohol would hardly involve such dire consequences. To kill all the women would be wholesale murder, and the suicide of the race. Does Brother Kelso charge any such fieudish purpose upon Prohibitionists? To be sure, we should miss whisky in politics, because whisky votes and womeu don't; but this is not as it should be. Women should be eufranchised and whisky extirpated. Most women are good. Some are partly bad. All whisky is bad. Besides, women do not degrade men. The charge is a slander. Even the most degraded women are a shield to the rest. It has beeu frequently urged that if it were not for brothels virtuous women could not safely walk the streets of our large cities. Thousands of women who were once innocent and beautiful hav been sacrificed upon the foul altar of man's brutal lusts, and then through all the long ages he has turned around with the sneaking plea, "The woman tempted me and I did eat." But our laws are prohibitory in regard to the exercise of the amatory propensities, excepting in mouogamic marriage. But these laws are not, and never hav been, an entire success. Adultery, bigamy, rape, etc., will prevail so long as the propensity of amativness exists, in spite of all prohibitory legislation. The reason, according to Brother Kelso, is obvious. The legislation should be directed entirely to the "bump" of amativness, and Anthony Comstock's head should be whittled off for a model. There is one difficulty, however, and that is that there would not be enough left of Touy's head to be a model of anything only for a specimen for a microscope.

Brother Kelso says, "So long as this appetite exists, so long as it calls with moncy for iutoxicating drinks, and so long as love of money exists, these drinks will be manufactured and sold, in spite of all prohibitory legislation." That is his opinion, not ours, and he will readily see that we are compelled to act upon our own opinion, not upon his.

"This appetite and this love of money depeud to a great extent upon certain cranial developments, certain phrenological bumps. These bumps, then, must be prohibited. In them we hav the root of the evil. . . . When our Prohibition friends go thus to the root of the evil, they may reasonably hope for success."

This argument assumes that any course of human conduct which depends upon cranial development is not a proper subject for legislation. Instead of legislating ou the couduct, we should "go down to the root of the evil," aud legislate on the bumps. But all human conduct depends upon cranial development. Therefore there should be no legislation upou human conduct. "Let us be consistent." Let us not single out liquor laws as an exception, but abolish all laws upon human conduct, and legislate on the bumps.

Men with large acquisitivness, destructivness, firmness, and secretivness, and small benevolence, are liable to commit robbery and other desperate crimes. Phrenologists will point out those most likely to perpetrate these crimes; hence our laws should not be against those who commit crimes or misdemeanors, but against their bumps. Besides, thousands of years of experience hav shown that so long as craniums are shaped wrong these crimes will continue, in spite of prohibitory laws. But, curiously euough, the appetite for ardent spirits does not in any way depend upon cranial development. Men of every possible form of cranium are victims.

A phrenologist might, with some degree of success, point out those who would be likely to sell whisky, but none ever did or ever will try to tell who is likely to driuk it. Many of them are in every respect good men and honest citizens when the poison is out of their reach. The higher the organization, the more fully developed the brain, the more effectiv the poison. The most enthusiastic optimist will hardly hope for a time within the next million years when the average man will equal some who hav become victims of alcohol. We appreciate all that has been said in regard to motivs and intentions of the church, but so long as we are compelled to legislate upon the liquor traffic we thiuk Prohibition is what we should aim at. To make it the monopoly of a few, as is done under license laws, and to punish their infringement, is as great an abridgement of personal freedom as Prohibition. The "moonshiners" in the South are hunted by government detectivs like wild beasts, not because they manufacture and sell a poison, but because they do not pay money for the privilege. What better is that than the selling of iudulgences, against which Luther protested? Now, it seems to me that what we are urgently in need of is not the advice of even as good and true men as we know Colonel Kelso and Professor Bell to be, but facts and logic, and upon these we are willing to decide. D. PRIESTLEY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Still Another Prize to Try For.

Since the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER we hav received another gift of five dollars for the Children's Corner. The kind donor desires to offer this sum, $5, for the best article on "Hygiene," competitors to be not over sixteen years of age. Time, three months from date.

Now, dear girls and boys, we want you to try your very best, for hygiene or the science of health is a grand and important topic, and we want your ideas upon the subject. Our aim in offering prizes is to stimulate thought, originate ideas, and ripen judgment. We are proud of our bright young thinkers, and hav no doubt that in mature manhood and womanhood many who are now children will look back to the Children's Corner as the place where they received the first inspiration to effort—to think for themselvs. Now let us see who will hav the best and brightest article on Hygiene. We thank our generous friend for the gift to the Corner, and his interest in our work.—ED. C. C.

CORRECTION.—The author of the story of "Little Sun Lee" printed in the Children's Corner, July 17th, and which won the prize offered by D. B. Cozine, is Laura Stewart, of Cleveland, Ohio, and not Cora, as inadvertently printed. We regret the error.

Always Sunrise Somewhere.

There is always sunrise somewhere!
Though the night be round thee drawn,
Somewhere still the east is bright'ning
With the rosy flush of dawn.
What though near the bat is flitting,
And the raven croaks his lay,
Somewhere still the sun-bird's greeting
Hails the rising of the day.

Let us lay to heart the comfort
In this sweet reflection found,
That, however dense our darkness,
Somewhere still the world around
Dews are glistening, flowers uplifting,
Wild birds warbling, as reborn,
Lakes and streams and woods and mountains
Melting in the kiss of morn!

Ne'er the night, however dismal,
But withdrew its wings of gloom;
Ne'er was sorrow but a day star
Did at last its depths illume.
Ne'er was woe but in its bosom
Was the seed of hope impearled,
There is still a sunrise somewhere,
Speeding, speeding round the world.

Biographical.

COPERNICUS.

A boy of fifteen was asked the other day: "Who was Copernicus?" He did not know. That the boys and girls of our acquaintance may not be so ignorant of so important a character, we write this sketch of a truly great and noble man.

Nicholas Copernicus was born at Thorn, in Prussia, on the 19th of February, 1473. He obtained the first principles of a scientific and classical education in his father's house, afterward attending the university at Cracow, where he studied medicin and graduated with honors. He had a great liking for mathematics and astronomy, and went to Rome, pursuing these studies and gaining there a great reputation for scientific investigation.

Afterward he returned to his nativ land and was made a canon of Frauenburg by the bishop of Ermeland, who was his uncle. He attended faithfully to his ministerial duties, at the same time giving his medical services to the poor without money and without price. He gave all his spare time to the study of astronomy, which still engaged his attention. He was a quiet, grave man, wasting no time in frivolous amusements. After an examination of the then generally accepted systems of astronomy, he made up his mind that they were incorrect in many particulars, and he set about to explain the motions of the planets upon a more scientific and certain principle. As a result, he solved the then complex system of planetary revolution to his complete satisfaction, but owing to the ignorance and bigotry of the human mind of that day and age, he dared not publish his discoveries for the long period of thirty-six years, fearing persecution and that he would be put to death for publishing knowledge not in accordance with the popular ideas.

The general idea was at that time that the sun moved around the earth, and very few doubted that the sun and moon obeyed Joshua when he commanded them to stand still, as related in the Bible.

Of course, the new theory upset all such silly fancies, but the people believed them just the same, simply because they were recorded in the "holy scriptures." Martin Luther expressed great disapprobation at the new system revealed by Copernicus, and said of him that he was an "old fool," and that he was destroying the whole science of astronomy, and to prove that he was right had recourse to the Bible, which naturally supported Luther's assertions. Copernicus was the first who dared to differ with the biblical teaching upon that subject, and for this reason he deferred publishing his discoveries for so long a time. Hidden in darkness, therefore, he kept his MSS. for thirty-six long years, and then, when the first printed copy was at length brought to him, he lay upon his death-bed, beyond the reach of the persecutor's hand.

But it was nearly a hundred years after his death before his system met with a kind and general reception. It was the greatest astronomical contribution ever given to the world, because a true one, and easily proven. In later times it has been modified somewhat by the genius of Galileo, Newton, Kepler, and others, but its general principles remain the same.

The tower from which Copernicus made his observations, and the ruins of a hydraulic machine constructed by him, are still in existence at Frauenburg. He died at that place in 1543. Monuments hav been raised to his memory, one at Cracow and one at Thorn; also a colossal statue by Thorwaldsen was erected to his memory at Warsaw in 1829. The four-hundredth anniversary of his birth was celebrated at Posen Feb. 19, 1873.

Copernicus was a great and wonderful man. The world owes him a debt of gratitude for the splendid addition he made to general science in an age clouded by ignorance, bigotry, and superstition. As the years go on his memory will be more and more reverenced, and Copernicus will be cherished as "one of the few, the immortal names that were not born to die."

The Ducks.

Oh, Charley, what do you think I've seen
Down the hill by the brook?
An old mother hen and ducklings ten—
Do come with me now and look.

It's such a cool and shady spot—
The banks are bright and green,
And thousands of flowers are blooming there,
The loveliest ever seen.

The great elms bend their branches down,
And the sun pours down so bright
That every tiny buttercup
Is a blaze of golden light.

The wood anemones cluster there,
The ferns grow green and tall,
And the violets bend to the water's edge;
But the ducks are sweeter than all.

We'll giv them meal, which they'll shovel down
In a hungry, funny way;
Such broad yellow beaks and web-footed toes—
"Never a finer breed," you'll say.

Their little round backs all covered with down,
Their breasts all covered with gold,
And they swim about in the shining brook,
And splash in the water cold.

While the poor old hen looks on amazed—
Such doings to her are new;
Never mother had such a wilful brood—
Oh, dear! what can she do?

With fright and flutter and cluck and clack,
She calls, but they answer "No."
And louder and louder she cries, "Come back!
You'll drown if you do so."

One after another they gaily dash
In and out of the water bright;
In their frolic they heed not her call,
And care not for her fright.

But night will come, and, tired of play,
They'll seek her sheltering wing;
The patient hen won't turn away,
She'll guard them like a king.

A FRIEND writes: "I am delighted with your idea of training the minds of children. It givs them a chance to rise faster, truer, and better than anything I hav yet heard of. It really looks as though our children would not hav to go to school until half old enough to die before ever being known to express an original idea."——We thauk our friend for his pleasant and encouraging words. Our hands and heart are strengthened in our work by the consciousness that our efforts are being heartily seconded and approved by the parents and relativs of the children for whom we labor.—ED. C. CALISTOGA, CAL., July 8, 286.

EDITOR CHILDREN'S CORNER, Dear Madam: Seeing that no girl but myself writes to the Children's Corner from this valley, I guess I'll try and tell you how we are getting along out here.

My father and I hav had a hard spell of the pneumonia which kept us down for about six weeks. I was not so bad as papa, and am quite well now, but he is not able to do more than walk about with the support of a cane.

I am going to tell you about our Fourth of July celebration. It was held on the fifth, because the people were too religious to hold it on the fourth. I think if the soldiers could fight for their country's freedom on that day that we should not think it wrong to celebrate the right day, if it did fall on Sunday. It seemed as though all had passed and we were bringing up the tag-end, as one of my schoolmates expressed it.

And then, the town officials would allow no firearms or shooting of any kind, not even firecrackers. Other years the popping of firecrackers and booming of cannon were heard throughout the day. But this celebration seemed so quiet and uninteresting!

The picnic was held in the Springs grounds, where some years ago the place was a scene of beautiful flowers, shrubbery, and trees, but lately used as a cow-pasture, free to everyone who wished to go there as any other field, but on the fifth it was closed and "Fifty cents admission"—closed on the very day, of all days, on which it ought to be free.

The platform for dancing was cool and shady, being canopied with fir boughs and decked with flags. The music by the Calistoga Brass Band was excellent, and that is about all that I think was good.

The races did not amount to much, and the "Horribles"—why, you could see at any masquerade ball twice the strikingly grotesque and ludicrous figures we saw there. I do not tell you of our celebration here meaning to complain, for, as it was, I had a pretty good time. I hope, though, you had a more glorious and patriotic Fourth than I did, and enjoyed yourself immensely.

Yours for freedom, A. LILE WEYBRIGHT.

The Town of Liberal, Mo.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

Your extended account and comments on the troubles in Liberal, as gathered from your issue of July 17th, justify me in asking your indulgence for a short space, that we may be set right before your readers. I think if all the truth were known, the genuin Freethought people of the world would justify us in all we did or had a hand in doing; and when I say us I wish to comprehend ninety-nine-one-hundredths of the entire inhabitants of the town of Liberal. You know as much about a mob visiting one Youmans as I do. All I know about such a gathering came from Youmans, and, if what he said is true, he is quite as much to blame as they. As I got it, a few young fellows visited Youmans at a late hour at night and told him to leave within twenty-four hours. Whereupon he fired on them out of the window, and they returned the shot. This is his story as told the next morning, as I understand. I hav endeavored to ascertain if there was a mob and the participants in it, and I can get no closer to it than what I hav related. I do know, however, as well as I know anything from analogy, that no citizen of Liberal participated in any such gathering or countenanced it. On the other hand I hav reasons to believe that no such gathering ever occurred; that the whole thing was a make-believe mob to raise a little cheap boom for prostitution, which hopes to find respectability through Freethought. I assure you those freelovers are very obnoxious to the people round about the county, as you may see from the following from the Southwest Missourian:

Henry Replogle is, as we learn, publishing a freelove paper in Liberal. Mr. Replogle is the man who, on one occasion, left Liberal because of his detection in a transaction strongly illustrating the doctrins he now preaches, and the pressure of public sentiment directed in the channel of purity and love undefiled will again force him to seek other fields for the promulgation of his infamous creed. Barton county has no room for such men.

You see from the above the feeling against them. Am I to blame for that? Should I be condemned if the people from the country rise against them? I cannot control them, and I am not responsible for what they may do. I hav been intrumental in protecting them from violence on two occasions, and would do it again, though I am unjustly accused of encouraging mob violence by the very parties I hav protected. I would not hav the vilest wretch on earth mobbed, but I am not responsible if a person so conducts himself as to bring about such a state of affairs.

No one has ever been persecuted here for opinion's sake, unless it be those believing in the sacredness of the family relations. They hav ever been the objects of hatred by the misogamists and church people alike—one because they will not succumb to their philosophy (?) or rather passions, and the other, because they do not fall into the snare and verify Christian predictions that "Freethought tends to a lower morality." So it is we are constantly under the cross-fire and combined assaults of freelust and the church. We might complain of persecution very properly. We may fail; we may fall before the allied powers of priestcraft and misogamy; but we will never surrender. We will never tear from the family altar the purity of mother, wife, sister, daughter. When they are assaulted we will not seek some recluse of safety, but we will meet the libertin and harlot at the threshold of our home, and defend the innocence within. If this be persecution of them, then place us in that list in double-capped letters.

Let me say to you, and through your extensivly circulating paper to your readers, be not deceived by the siren song of belief. There is not an intellectual belief in freelove on earth. The whole theory of freelove is founded on an improper action of the cerebellum, and not the intellect. It follows the dictates of passion, not of pure belief. It is the child of lust, and not of love; of brutal desire, not reform.

No one should presume to interfere with another's belief. But we should not be confounded between public practice and private opinion. A man may believe it is proper to take the life of a human being, but when he attempts to practice it, it at once becomes our duty to prevent the murder. He may believe in self-defilement and free lust, but when he attempts their public practice, to the ruin of others, he then interferes with the rights of others, and they may properly object.

The time has come for Freethought journals to take one side or the other of this practice. They hav either to come out and squarely denounce that ism, or register their influence on the side of universal prostitution made respectable (?) through Freethought, which at once will kill the whole movement in America—and it ought to. With all the faults lying at the door of the church, we can say, to its honor, it does not recognize one organ, in all its hundreds of papers, that advocates the promiscuous relations of the sexes. Would that we could say as much for Freethought.

You hint that the mob might hav caused Mr. Chaapel to withdraw from the Liberal. We will say, No, it was his philosophy (?) on the social question that made the vacancy. He and Warren Chase are referred to by Youmans to verify his misrepresentations. Neither of them was present at the hall, and neither of them knows anything about it of their knowledge. No honorable or truthful man will verify their statements, because they are not true.

In all of my work in the Liberal cause I hav endeavored to represent Freethought in the highest conception of ethical culture. I hav made some mistakes, no doubt, but never to the debasement of the cause, to my knowledge. My work has always been to arrive at a higher and a better condition. If I hav been radical, it has been in accordance with my conception of right. To this course I hav had much opposition, and will likely hav much more. This opposition comes from those claiming to be Liberals.

The truth is, Liberal is the mark for all the cranks in the country to shoot at. They all come here and expect us to turn their crank; and if we fail to do so, as we always do, then we are registered as an autocrat, opinionated, il-Liberal, and as many other endearing names as hatred and malice can coin. Every misfortune and ill of the county, from the discomfiture of a freelove nest to a colicky babe, is laid to me, and I must bear it all. I hav borne it for six years, and am willing to bear it for six more, but would be glad to giv the place up to anyone who would like to try the experiment. I hav a good property, worth about fifty thousand dollars, consisting in part of a good coal-mine, now in activ operation, which will pay fifteen per cent on the investment, with at least thirty thousand dollars' worth of other property, which I would like to sell to some man, or company of men, who will come and take my place, and I will giv two thousand dollars to anyone who will find me a purchaser. While I attach but little importance to this freelove "tempest in a teapot," I believe some one else could take my place with advantage to the cause and profit to themselvs.

In conclusion, let me say, that "shot-gun" howl of the freelusters is all bosh. Stewart said "if a man should defile his daughter, he would use a shot-gun on him, but he would not advise others to take his remedy into their hands." Mr. Stewart made no attack on any one; he criticised an "ism" called freelove, for which he was personally abused by them. What he said has been misrepresented and the whole Freethought country put ablaze by the aggressors and those in the wrong, and your usually just paper used to the injury of your friends. G. H. Walser.

Liberal, Mo.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

I wish to commend the very fair hearing you hav giv our trouble here, and set you right on our attitude as regards the "airing in and out of season of our doctrins." We hav never attempted to advocate social reform in a public place or meeting at any time. Mr. Moore has not even expressed himself to me on that question, and has never approached it in public. Stewart having made a strong tirade against freelove, and Walser calling a vote afterward, naturally made those present fear a reply to his lecture, but none was intended. It was against his mobocratic attitude that the devoted four arose, but the crowd would not listen to them for a considerable time, stamping and calling out "Sit down!" About thirty persons, out of the whole, stand and are ostracized with us, among whom are the broader-minded and more substantial ones of the town. As many more are rabid and stand with Walser and Stewart. The remainder are neutral, and swayed by the majority or greatest noise. Those who hav been considered heretofore the best citizens are disgusted with Walser's proceedings and are discouraged. Many are kept quiet by having their homes mortgaged to him. He would crush them if they said a word, they feel sure. We hav said as little about things as was consistent with honesty, and were very mild on radical questions, but all to no purpose; they knew our principles, and Stewart made capital out of them to win notoriety. Walser cannot stand the idea of another paper. He has just crushed, by mortgage, a newspaper in the Christian town adjoining. Having no other hold on us, he encouraged mob demonstrations, and has finally recommended starving out and law, whenever anything can be caught that will do at all; but we watch close that he may not get us where we cannot easily prove more than we say. I should like to giv more facts and spirit of the affair, but hav not time now. H. P. Replogle.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by Benj. R. Tucker.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Poetry.

The Bravest Battle.

The bravest battle that ever was fought!
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the maps of the world you will find it not;
'Twas fought by the mothers of men.

Nay, not with cannon, or battle shot,
With sword, or nobler pen;
Nay, not with eloquent word or thought
From mouths of wonderful men.

But deep in a walled-up woman's heart—
Of woman that would not yield,
But bravely, silently, bore her part—
Lo! there is that battle-field!

No marshaling troop, no bivouac song;
No banner to gleam and wave!
But, oh! these battles, they last so long—
From babyhood to the grave!

—Joaquin Miller.

The Little Song.

A little song, a shallow song,
He wrote and put it by;
The fire of genius high and strong
Shone in his youthful eye.
Burnt in his soul, coursed through his veins,
He felt the power of nobler strains.

Years passed. In poor obscurity
He struggled on and on;
Men glanced upon him heedlessly;
His life's best years were gone.
Broken, world-weary, and alone,
With shattered hopes, unsought, unknown!

One day he chanced to find among
Old papers dusty gray,
The song he wrote when he was young,
That he had thrown away.
"Thou foolish little song!" cried he,
"I'll try my hapless luck with thee."

A little song to touch the heart
Dawned on the world one day,
A song to make the quick tears start,
Yet comfort care away—
A song so tender, exquisit,
It won the world through being sweet.

Well did it serve the bard at last,
That song of long ago;
After so many years had passed,
He woke one morn to know
That he had won a world-wide name—
His little song had brought him fame.

A Discouraged Pastor's Confession.

The Chicago Herald gets the following from a local barber: "You've heard of people getting discouraged so that they feel just like throwing up the sponge and quitting, havn't you? Well, there was a man of that kind in here the other day. He was feeling terribly blue, too, and I'll bet that in a week you couldn't guess what business he was in. No, he wasn't a dealer in ice cream, nor in baby carriages, nor in roller skates. He wasn't the proprietor of a blanket sheet newspaper, nor the manager of a legitimate theater company, nor the pioneer of a dress reform. He was a minister of the gospel, and preaches every Sunday to a congregation on the West Side. He was not only dejected, but he was confidential. He used to shave with me regularly, and he and I were warm friends for years. So he had no hesitation in talking to me right out in meeting, as it were. And this is the way he went on:

"'Barber,' says he, 'I am discouraged. I don't deny it—I am downcast. Things are not going right. I mean in the church—in all the churches. There is something wrong. I can't tell what it is, but I know there should be a change. Very likely you know me well enough to know that I am in earnest in my work; that the cause of the master is dearer to me than my own life, and that of all the orthodox I am the most rigid and unswerving. There is no dissension in my church, no lack of good will between pastor and people, no unusual scandal, no scarcity of funds, and fair attendance at services. The trouble is deeper than this. It is even more serious. It is a case of dry rot, of decay at the roots, of lifelessness in the branches, of drying up in the marrow.

"'Sundays are days which try my soul. It is not the work I perform, the efforts I am called upon to make, which harrass me, but the character of the soil into which the seed is cast. I never leave my pulpit without feeling oppressed by the indifference which I hav been facing, the listlessness against which I hav been struggling. My congregations are large enough, but they are so inanimate. They listen, but they do not hear. It is not casting pearls before swine, but like distributing books among bushes and hoping that the shrubs will read and learn how to grow into trees. There are exceptions, I know; there are listeners who drink in the gospel eagerly, and whose faces appear to me like oases in a human desert. But for one such there are a score of blanks with eyes which see no farther than the pews where their neighbors sit, and with ears which listen only for the organ peal which shall signal the approach of the end of the services. There are scores of women thinking only of the dresses or faces about them; scores of men slyly dozing or with thoughts upon business, sports, or politics. Perhaps I am singularly unfortunate, but so constituted am I that in the course of a sermon I involuntarily count these blank faces and compare their great number to the few upon whose countenances can be seen the light of interest and thought. After each sermon I feel more dejected than on the previous Sabbath, and I know that the day is coming when my will and courage shall fail me, and rather than chill in the effort to warm these ice floes I will seek other avenues of usefulness.

"'No doubt, barber, you are unable to fully appreciate my dejection, and to understand the depth of my despair, and the shudders which shake my frame when I enter the pulpit. No doubt you will say I am foolish for giving way to such emotions, and that I should be satisfied as long as the people who employ me are content with what they get. But I cannot help it. The stolid indifference of my hearers to the thoughts and sentiments contained in my sermons is painful to me, because I know that in all of the churches in this city the same scenes are enacted. Not only here, but all over the country, are similar exhibitions to be found every Sabbath.

"'We still hav congregations, it is true, but only because it is fashionable to go to church. It is the thing to do. Church attendance is with a large portion of the people a mere matter of duty and faith rather than desire. With others it is habit, perfunctorily performed. And with only a few—and they generally the aged or afflicted—is it the fruition of earnest wish to hear the sacred truths, and drink in new spiritual life and nutriment.

"'This is a matter that is worthy serious thought. Reflect that in the United States there are seventy-five thousand ministers, preaching to more than that many congregations. How much influence upon the character, the morals, and the lives of the people of this country hav the unceasing efforts of this vast army of laborers in the master's vineyard? Is it not a fact that a few hundred editors of leading daily newspapers make greater impress upon their fellow-men than all of the ministers in our pulpits? Is it not a fact that the four English Sunday newspapers of Chicago, with their varied contents relating to all of the affairs of life, with blended news, sentiment, opinion, business, romance—in each something to touch the heart or appeal to the reason—are far more powerful in their influence upon the half-million people of this city than all of the sermons uttered in our hundreds of pulpits? Some of the newspapers print sermons, and I used to write out my discourses and giv copies to the newspapers until, upon investigation, I found that, save on occasions of special interest, not one newspaper reader in a hundred perused the pulpit thoughts. Everything, even the advertisments, would be read—everything but the sermons. Five hundred people attend church, and only a few dozen bear away with them and remember till the following day even a single thought from the discourse. Sermons printed in newspapers will not be read. Of what use, then, are sermons? And, after all, can it be true that the gloom which settles over me on observing the mere fashionable presence but habitual indifference of my parishioners in their pews, is an instinctiv recognition of the fact that in cities, at least, the pulpit is a failure, and that thousands of able, earnest men are laboring week after week in a barren field?

"'Barber, you are a regular attendant at church, and I think you will agree with me that it is not the fault of the sermons. The churches of America were never better equipped with preachers than to-day—the discourses were never before so broad, so timely, so able. The trouble is not with the ministers, but with the people. They are drifting away from sermons. Year after year the masses are becoming less serious and reflectiv. In the change from earnest thoughtfulness to frivolity and miscellany and 'light stuff,' the newspapers hav led the way. This generation seems to hav eschewed thought and to be willing to do everything by instinct.

"'As good and pious a man as you, barber, knows very well that religion is nothing if it is not earnest and deep. It must be drawn from the great hights and the depths of the infinit. Religion is enthusiasm for good, and enthusiasm cannot be made of habit; it cannot consist of fashionableness; it cannot thrive upon indifference and blankness of faith and dozing eyes. There is still plenty of religion in the world, and plenty of it in Chicago, too, but sermons are losing their potency because religion is changing its character. We still hav the old sermons, but the new religion needs no sermons at all. The religion of the infinit revealed is giving place to a religion of humanity. It is seen everywhere, but its best forms are found in the church. The ministers go on with their sermons about the revelation and the book and the interpretation, but it is in social leadership, in encouraging the meeting together of men and women and children, in the moral and general teachings of the Sabbath-schools, in pound partying, sociables, Christmas-trees, and, above all, in the aid societies and the many works of charity clustering about it that the church finds its real power. The sermons are nowhere. They deal with religion in the abstract, while the new religion is practical. The religion of deep and serious conviction, of earnestness and great faith, of communion with the scriptures and with the inspirer of all, is passing away. The present power of the church is social, not spiritual. Preaching is merely endured, and pastoral prayer is a form. The choir is more potent than the pulpit. And yet, out of deference to custom, a vast army of noble men go on week after week laboring and struggling and producing each year millions of sermons which fall upon the people like useless handbills upon a cold and cheerless pavement.

"'It is appreciation of the vastness of this wasted energy which oppresses me, barber, and fills me full of sadness and foreboding. I tremble for the future of a religion that is so drifting. I yearn for some work in life that will giv me listening and thinking men to talk to—a sphere of usefulness in which I need not be a mere tolerated relic, but an actuality and indispensable. Can you advise me?'

"'Certainly,' says I. to my dear and long-winded pastor, 'certainly, sir. Try barbering.'"

Obituary.

DIED.—At her home in Brentwood, L. I., on July 2d, Mrs. Emily Codman, wife of our esteemed friend and co-worker in the cause of truth, Chas. A. Codman.

It is fitting always on the close of a life to pause awhile amid our activities to contemplate the mystery of death; and that not only out of respect for the departed, but for the moral and spiritual welfare of the living as well.

It was one of the religious rites of the ancient Egyptians to hold a court of inquiry on the character of each deceased person, to ascertain his fitness for another life, as disclosed by his conduct in this. We of the nineteenth century, as we stand at the open grave, or at the crematory furnace, ponder, not so much, if at all, the fitness of the individual for another life, but whether there be a future state at all, or an objectiv soul to be happy or to suffer in it. Such, after nineteen hundred years of Christian teaching, is the state of mind of the thoughtful to-day, so unsolved is this problem.

On such sad occasions (said in the sense of sundering existing objectiv relations; but not said from another and higher point of view) we hav in the past been consoled or comforted with one or the other of two philosophies—one thoroughly pessimistic in its tone, teaching that life at the best is hardly worth living, and that "death ends all;" the other optimistic in its tendency, asserting that, so far from death ending all, it is only a preparatory state for a never-ending life of bliss or of woe hereafter. Formerly the rejection of one of these theories (for neither of them is susceptible of proof) meant the acceptance of the other. Not so, however, now, for a new philosophy and a new religion has recently obtained, which, while assenting to the fundamental dogma of each, in a sense not contemplated by its adherents, givs to those ideas a more profound signification and a higher use than either is capable of in this literal and objectiv meaning; or, in other words, the new philosophy of Positivism agrees with the Materialist that death does end all objectivly, but that it is by no means the end of the subjectiv life of which the objectiv (body) was only an instrument or tool.

To the Christian it concedes another and a never-ending life, but not such a gross one as his religion teaches. The soul (not as an entity but as an influence) does indeed liv, and in truth can never die. It livs as an influence either for good or evil made by the instrument (the body) on its surroundings, becoming on the destruction of the body an infinitesimal part of the great being, humanity.

If any is at a loss to understand this immortality of influence, let him conceive of life with all the results of past generations blotted out, and what would be left to the man of to-day? Are not the works of genius more real to us than was the living man? The influence on the world of all men, it is true, is far from being alike, still, like the drop of water to the ocean, it forms a part of a whole.

"There is neither mysticism nor hyperbole, but simple observation, in the belief that the career of every human being in society does not end with the death of the body. In some sort its higher activities and potency can only begin truly when change is no longer possible; for the worthy gain influence and range at each generation, just as the founders of some populous race gain a greater fatherhood at each succeeding growth of their descendants.

"The humblest life that ever turned a sod sends a wave, no, more than a wave—a life—through the ever-growing harmonies of human society. Not a soldier died at Marathon or Salamis but did a stroke by which our thought is enlarged and our standard of duty formed to this day. 'John Brown's body lies a-moldering in the grave, but his soul is marching on.'"

This new view of immortality, which is in perfect harmony with science, has also all the ennobling influences on character and healthful tendencies that are claimed for the old belief in objectiv immortality; for, while the motiv underlying the wish for an objectiv immortality is purely a selfish one, the desire to liv again in our good works is purely altruistic.

To this new conception of another life our departed sister inclined during her later years. Its influence on her character was good, as it must necessarily be on all who accept it. The reason why its influence must be healthful and ennobling is, that it lifts the individual to a higher plane of thought and action; it eliminates egotism and cultivates altruism.

The individual who is forever anxious about "his soul's salvation" is actuated only through love of his personality, while he who seeks or hopes to "join the choir invisible," does so only that others may be made better and happier thereby.

Dissatisfied with the low aims, frivolities, and inharmony of life as led by the multitude, a few gifted minds, about forty years ago, inspired by the writings of Fourier, Brisbane, Warren, Andrews, and others, of whom Margaret Fuller, Hawthorne, and Thoreau were types, sought by their writings and example to inspire others with the like aspirations.

In our departed sister they found an apt and enthusiastic disciple. Imbued with the desire for a more harmonious and truer life than could be found in society as now constituted, she left her New England home to join one of the many attempts then being made to realize their aspirations for a truer life. This attempt was made at Modern Times (now Brentwood), on the principles taught by Josiah Warren, which, it was believed, would make it possible for men to deal equably and justly with each other, and to so adjust their relations as to make harmony and peace possible, and thus escape the great and growing inharmony in human society, and the unequal distribution of wealth from which so many evils spring.

The world, unfortunately, was not then prepared to accept principles so just. Had it been so prepared, how different would society now be! But we believe it is only a matter of time. The good seed has been sown, fruitage must some day follow.

> For ever the truth comes uppermost,
> And ever is justice done.

The effect of this unselfish philosophy upon the character of our sister was also manifested in her domestic life. She was ever planning how to amuse and make life pleasant to those around her, and especially to children. She was, indeed, a social queen, whose memory will be held in grateful remembrance by all, but especially by the young, whose happiness she did so much to promote.

As an evidence of her freedom from superstition, she was an ardent advocate of cremation, and it was among her last requests that her body should be incinerated, which request was religiously fulfilled by her husband.

Thus passed Emily Codman from objectiv life into the collectiv humanity.

A young fellow named Brodie successfully dropped from the Brooklyn Bridge into the East River one day last week. He was picked up uninjured. The charges were sustained by the committee. Mr. Alderson was one of the instigators of the charges against Rev. Mr. Fullmer, late a pastor at the same place, who was tried for conduct which reflected discredit on the church, the charges being also sustained.

The Rev. Johannes Van den Brock is pastor of the Arminian church at Paterson, N. J. Though possessed of an estimable wife, his conduct toward other women has caused a scandal. John Hartman, a parishioner, warned the dominie of this, and the clergyman gave him a thrashing, and bit a big piece of flesh out of his arm. Hartman procured a warrant for Van den Brock's arrest, and the officers who went to execute the same found the clergyman half dressed in the apartments of an unmarried woman. He was held in two hundred dollars bail. The woman says that the Rev. Mr. Van den Brock has wronged her.

Odds and Ends.

The good writers are not all dead. A special to a St. Louis paper says: "For a week past a dark gloom has been over this community, the clammy hand of pestilence having grasped it firmly."

A maiden once said, "I'll not mate with a man who has not fortune great." So she pouted and waited, and scorned to be mated. She's a maiden yet—age forty-eight.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

A maiden once thought, "I cannot be bought—I'll marry a man who is poor; but the man he drank beer, died driving a "keer," and twelve orphans went out from the door. 'Tis better to wait, and be aged forty-eight, than to marry the average man; for there's trouble ahead for the maiden who'll wed the very first person she can.—Courier Journal.

THE LANDOWNER AND THE MULE.

A rich man had a piece of land on which a young mule was grazing.

"I shall harness you," said the man to the mule, "and make you plough this land to grow melons on, of which I am very fond, while the stalks will amply supply you with food."

To which the mule replied: "If I consent to toil on your terms, you will hav all the melons and I shall be worse off than now, inasmuch as I shall hav to eat dry stalks instead of feeding on the fresh green grass. I'll not do it, sir."

"How unreasonable you are," remonstrated the landowner; "your father never had any other food but thistles, and yet would work sixteen hours, and even more, a day without grumbling."

"Alas! that is true!" retorted the mule. "But then, you know, my father was an ass."

The great poet of the future is to come out of the West, says Walt Whitman, and the Tribune has its eye upon the young lady who is to be the g. p. of the f. She livs at Bird's Island, in this state, and here is a sample of her work:

I rise at dawn, and, putting on my clothes,
Stride forth to cheer my eyes, and ears, and nose,
With nature's dulcet sights, and sounds, and smells.

And strolling through the woodland's mossy paths,
All undefiled with mortar, bricks, or laths,
I worship nature in her bosky dells.

And thinks me, as I view her wondrous work,
Dame Nature surely ne'er did halt or shirk,
But toiled e'en as the busy little bee.

And so may we, without a simp'ring smirk,
Nor yet with aught of discord, jar or jerk,
Toil on to glorious immortality.

A CELEBRATED MIRACLE EXPLAINED.

He was a devout Christian, and had made the study of the Bible and the proper understanding of the Big Book the highest aim of life. When he arrived at the Sea of Galilee his heart was filled with awe, and he felt renovated and cleansed by the thought that he was gazing on the very same spot where his savior once stood. Approaching the boatman, he addressed him in his choicest Arabic, and, with Bible and commentary in hand, awaited an answer.

"Ah! what smatter 'th yer? Why don't you talk the United States?" asked the man, contemptuously. He was a real live Yankee, who was picking up a living by ferrying tourists across the sea.

"So this is the Sea of Galilee," devoutly murmured the searcher after knowledge.

"Ya-a-s."

"And this is where our savior walked upon the waters?"

"Ya-a-s."

"How much will you charge to take me to the exact spot?"

"Wa-a-l, you look like a clergyman, an' I won't charge you nothin'."

The devout one boarded the boat, and at last was pointed out where the miracle is said to hav occurred. After gazing at the waters, and dividing his time between glances at his books and devout ejaculations of satisfaction, the searcher signified his willingness to return.

"Charge you $20 to take you back," said the speculativ Yankee.

"But you said you would charge nothing."

"Naw, didn't. Nothin' to bring you out; twenty to get back."

"And do you charge everybody $20 to take them back?" asked the astonished searcher.

"Ya-a-s. That's about the figger."

"Well, then," said the devout one, as he went down in his clothes, "no wonder Jesus Christ got out and walked."

Men call the circumstance the retribution. The causal retribution is in the thing and is seen by the soul. The retribution in the circumstance is seen by the understanding; it is inseparable from the thing, but is often spread over a long time, and so does not become distinct for many years. The specific stripes may follow late after the offense, but they follow because they accompany it. Crime and punishment grow out of one stem. Punishment is a fruit that, unsuspected, ripens within the flower of the pleasure that concealed it.—Emerson's Essays.

At the present day Christianity, as a religious system, is on the wane just as surely as the pagan religion was sixteen hundred years ago. Its many positiv excellences, its moral purity, its teachings of brotherhood, charity, and forgiveness, remain, and will ever remain, as permanent blessings to mankind, but its deification of Jesus, its claim to being the prophesied faith of faiths, its supernatural stories, its more recently manufactured creeds, with their revolting dogmas and inconsistencies, and its worship of an infallible church by the Catholic wing, and its worship of an infallible Bible by the Protestant wings—all these are surely and steadily crumbling away.—Stoddard's New Faith.

Cromwell, though his hold over the hearts of the English people is growing all the time, still remains in an "uncovenanted" condition. The problem of his statue is still, and, so far as England is concerned, seems likely long to be, unsolved. Put him high or low, in the line of kings or out of it, he is hopelessly incongruous, incommensurable, and out of place. He is, in fact, the man of the New World; his institutions in the main embody the organic principles of the New World society. At Washington, not at Westminster, should be his statue.—Goldwin Smith.

The water seems to know enough to run down hill without being directed, the sun seems to know how to shine without superintendence, the winds are able to blow, the waves of the ocean to roll, the grass and the corn don't fail to grow in the spring without an instructor or mover, and so it is with everything in the universe. The earth revolves with unerring precision; the planets move in obedience to unalterable laws of the universe; the world and stars follow the same laws, and nothing needs an additional pushing power, nothing requires a director; there is absolutely nothing for divine providence to attend to; there is no more conceivable use for any God than there is for a million of them. The universe is superior to all imaginary gods, and has not the slightest use for them.—Bennett's Infidel Abroad.

Are you married? Hav you a wife you love? She dies and you die also. You, from your first speech to your last, hav ever said, "I believe," much as a well-trained parrot might say it. You had never examined your reasons for your faith; as a true believer should, you distrusted the efficacy of your carnal reason. You said, "I believe in God and in Jesus Christ," because you had been taught to say it, and you would as glibly say, "I believe in Allah, and in Mohammed his prophet," had your birth-place been a few degrees eastward, and your parents and instructors Turks. You believed in this life, and after death to awake in heaven. Your much-loved wife did not think as you did—she could not. Her organization, education, and temperament were all different from your own! She disbelieved because she could not believe. She was a good wife, but she disbelieved; a virtuous, kindly woman, but she disbelieved; a good, affectionate mother, but she disbelieved. And you are to be happy for an eternity in heaven, while she is writhing in agony in hell!—Bradlaugh.

JOHN H. SMITH, ex-minister to Liberia, says the Mohammedans are making more converts among the negroes than the Christian missionaries. There are about thirteen thousand negroes from the United States in the colony.

THE Rev. Dr. Bartol, a Concord philosopher, is credited with the statement that he would not abolish hell if he could. This leads to the conclusion that the weather has not been as warm in Concord this summer as it has been in New York.

MRS. CLEVELAND, the president's wife, was taken into the Presbyterian church at Washington as a member last Sunday. It is thought that this will place the whole people, to some extent, on praying ground and interceding terms of mercy, or words to that effect.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX sees poetry even in cremation. She says: "Snowy clothing envelops it [the body], the door swings noiselessly open, the iron cradle that appears like a nuptial bed disappears in a glory of crimson light as a dove flies into the crimson sunlight and disappears from view."

MRS. JOHN PRILL, of Pittsburgh, Pa., became greatly frightened during a thunder shower one day last week. She ran to her bed-chamber for a bottle of holy water, to ward off danger, but instead she got one filled with sulphuric acid. She dashed the contents upon her face in considerable quantities, and when the neighbors came in response to her cries, they found her writhing in pain on the floor. A physician who was called says that Mrs. Prill has destroyed her eyesight, and that her face will be disfigured as long as she livs.

THE Examiner, a religious paper, thus laments: "It is sad and humiliating that ministers of the gospel should fall into sin, and nothing is more common than to see the facts spread out in the newspaper press."

TEMPERANCE women in the Prohibition village of Marshalltown, Ia., watched the drug store sales of liquors for a month, and ascertained that the six druggists sold 112¼ gallons of whiskey, 2,197 bottles of beer, 81 gallons of alcohol, 6 gallons of brandy, 8 gallons of gin, 1 barrel of ale, and 5 gallons of wine.

A CLERGYMAN'S wife, calling on Mrs. Gladstone at Hawarden, remarked in speaking of the elections that these were troublous times. "But," ejaculated she, piously, "there is one above that will guide us." "Yes," said Mrs. Gladstone, "he will see through it; and if you will take a seat I dare say he will be down-stairs in a few minutes."

A BOSTON boy was learning his Sunday-school lesson with the words, "Consider the lilies of the field how they grow; they toil not neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you that—" here the boy paused, forgetting the next word, and then proceeded with a pronounced voice, "Sullivan in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

A CLERGYMAN who livs in Southern Washington county, Mass., and who is addicted to farming, during the recent dry spell prayed very earnestly for rain. Within a few hours the rain came, and wet, among other things, a jag of hay which the clergyman had neglected to put under cover. The clergyman confesses that he didn't know his prayer was loaded.

A LADY recently sought to instruct her little grandchild in relation to the provident care of heaven. "Who givs you your daily bread?" asked she. "Dod," replied the child, "but Uncle John puts the butter and sugar on." With the addition that "father pays for it," the part which God takes in furnishing daily bread might be dispensed with without appreciable loss.

A REVEREND bishop in California is disgusted at what he styles the loose way in which children are brought up nowadays. He would like to return to the "spare the rod and spoil the child" theory, and complains that "a man can no longer correct his child without being reported. Society interferes." Well, that depends. If by "correcting his child" the good bishop means that the parent has no longer the right to nail his ears to a lamp-post, or to thrash him until the birch forest givs out, or to snap a coach whip at his legs in order to teach him to honor his parents, that his days may be long—why, there is a certain amount of objection among decent folk, it must be confessed. It's bad form to grumble because the law will not allow you to beat your children over the head with a chair.—Herald.

SAYS the Cincinnati Commercial, touching funeral insincerity: "To preach a funeral sermon over a good man, praising his good life, commending it as an example to the living, and soothing the mourners by a contemplation of the virtues of the departed, is a high and graceful task. It is in line with the custom of those classical peoples whom we call pagan, because they subdivided the persons of their gods more than we, to pronounce funeral orations over the great dead. But in our different circumstances the preaching of funeral sermons runs into the abandonment of discrimination. The preacher is not even allowed to limit his funeral preaching to the members of his own church. Even in his own sheep there may be wethers whose lives are not commendable; but he must also preach over their relations who do not belong to his flock; over their scapegrace sons; over their infants, who hav not yet had any lives to make an example of; indeed, over anybody that happens to drop there. In the case of his morally inferior sheep he has to be silent on their failings, and to strain at their undeveloped virtues. In the case of their 'impenitent' or wicked sons and other relations he has to invent some way of slipping them through the judgment which he has preached for all men. Thus his funeral sermons contradict his preached faith, and he preaches judgment to the living only to snatch the dead from it. To argue that this custom of prevarication, because it is called Christian charity, will not hav the inevitable effect of falsehood in loosening the character, is to deny that habitual sin is a growing force of moral degeneracy. Does it not bring the preacher to regard this, as a lawyer regards his perverting of justice, as a professional function which absolves him from moral principle? And can this be without an effect on character? Who can measure how much this untruthfulness undermines the preacher's truth in all things, and makes him look upon all as merely professional?"

Spiritual Photography—Report of the Investigating Committee.

The production of what is called a spirit face upon a negativ is so easy a process by ordinary means, that to attribute such pictures to the presence of disembodied spirits, in the absence of all proof that they are not produced directly by the photographer himself or by an assistant, is palpably absurd, and in contravention of the first principles of scientific investigation. Refusal or omission to furnish such proof is especially a badge of fraud, from the fact that if the phenomena are genuin it could be easily established by incontrovertible tests. In only one case within the knowledge of any of your committee has an offer been made to furnish such convincing tests; and that is the challenge under which we were appointed.

The challenge was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 10th, and explained so as to make it available in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 17th. The committee were immediately appointed, and accepted, and Mr. Robinson, who gave the challenge, was notified that they were ready to proceed.

Mr. W. M. Keeler, the "artist medium," was then absent in the South, and did not return until May 19th. From that time until June 11th no reply could be obtained from him, whether he would afford us an opportunity for the investigation, or whether he believed that there were any spirits who would cooperate with him and with us. If they could make an impression upon a photographic plate, we wished to aid them in establishing the verity of these results.

On that date Mr. Keeler wrote a letter to Mr. Robinson, for the committee, in which he declined to proceed with the investigation under the challenge, its conditions being "entirely too broad," and imposed conditions restricting the investigation. Upon personal conference between Mr. Keeler and the secretary of the committee, these conditions were placed in the following form:

1. There shall first be meetings of two or three of the Investigating Committee at a time, and finally one general meeting of the committee.
2. Mr. Keeler shall hav the opportunity of prescribing his own conditions one-half the time.
3. The details and results of the tests shall be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER in regular order as early as practicable.

The last condition we did not object to, and in accordance therewith this report is submitted.

We could not object to the second, without exposing the manner in which it would interfere with tests. We therefore confined our objection to the first condition. In a letter to Mr. Keeler, the secretary wrote as follows:

I am anxious that there shall be no circumstance connected with our investigation which will strike the public as suspicious. The condition which you impose restricting all of the meetings of the committee but one to three members is objectionable as an interference with investigation. We shall accept it because we think it probable that in spite of it we can come to some conclusion. But I think it is for your interest to withdraw it, because it will be said that its object is to draw our fire, to ascertain what our tests are before you will do anything, to divide and conquer.

He insisted, however, that the presence of so many skeptics at once would exert such a hostil influence that it would prevent our obtaining results. There were three sessions, at each of which two members only were present, while Mr. Keeler had around him such friends as he chose to invite. The absence of coöperation by the spirits cannot be attributed either to their being driven away by the presence of too many, nor to their getting miffed at the presence of so few. We admit, on the other hand, that there would not hav been any advantage, as it turned out, in having a larger attendance of the committee.

At the first two sessions the committee imposed no tests whatever. They merely coöperated in such tests as Mr. Robinson proposed, and observed conditions and results. At the third session, which lasted four hours, the secretary supervised the arrangements. Mr. Robinson had urged that we should giv the spirits as much of a chance as we could, and informed us that our handling the plates previous to exposure tended to prevent results. Having obtained only four negativs with the additional faces upon them during the previous four hours, we decided to giv every opportunity for the production of the negativs, whether by genuin or fraudulent means; and, while giving the spirits ample opportunity to demonstrate their presence under test conditions, to trust, if they did not avail themselvs of the opportunity, to the critical examination of the negativs themselvs. The spirits did not manifest any anxiety to make their presence known. Every one of the twenty-five negativs taken during the three sessions could evidently hav been produced under similar conditions by members of the committee.

Before taking up in detail the results obtained, the tests applied, the explanation of the objects of the tests, and the modes in which the additional faces might hav been produced, it is proper to say that notwithstanding the manifest reluctance with which Mr. Keeler entered upon the investigation, he cheerfully and unhesitatingly, at our last session, complied with all our conditions, and that the absence of decisiv results arose simply from the failure to produce a single additional face upon a negativ at any time under test conditions.

The first meeting of the committee was held at the residence of W. M. Keeler, the artist medium. Mr. Mason and the secretary were present on behalf of the committee. Mr. Robinson was also present. Four plates were exposed and developed, previous to which we examined the camera, the dark room, and surroundings generally. The secretary had brought with him three plates, which he marked.

Nos. 1 and 2; no result.

No. 3. Mr. Mason went into the dark room with Mr. Keeler, and, taking the last of the marked plates of Mr. Parkhurst, put on another mark of his own, and gave it to Mr. Keeler, who put it into the plate-holder in his presence. The developing-room is very small and unusually dark. We were all present during the exposure, after which Mr. Mason went into the developing-room, and saw the plate developed. In addition to the sitters, there appeared upon the negativ a face not recognized by anyone. The negativ had upon it both marks affixed previous to the exposure.

No. 4. No result, and the session having already lasted two hours, the committee adjourned.

In accordance with the condition imposed by Mr. Keeler, the second meeting of the committee was restricted to two members, Dr. Leigh and Dr. Foote. It was held on June 23d at Mr. Keeler's residence. Mr. Robinson was present. Nine additional plates were exposed, upon six of which there was no result. Upon Nos. 7 and 9, taken after Dr. Foote had left, there appeared additional faces. On No. 3 also there is an indefinit something. The conditions under which these three negativs were taken permitted the production of the additional faces by a method which I had explained to Mr. Robinson as a sufficient explanation of the additional face produced at the first session. The committee were not invited to and did not impose any test conditions.

The third meeting was held at the residence of Mr. Keeler, on June 26th. Dr. Leigh and Mr. Parkhurst were present for the committee. Mr. Robinson and several other Spiritualist friends were also present. As it was to be the last meeting, in consequence of Mr. Keeler's intended absence for the summer, Mr. Parkhurst, on motion, took charge of the arrangements and prescribed the conditions. The session lasted four hours, during which twelve additional plates were exposed. Upon five of these additional faces appeared.

In the three meetings the total time was eight hours. The total number of successful negativs under complete test conditions, 0; under prescribed partial test conditions, 3; without prescribed conditions, 6; total successful negativs, 9; the number of failures under complete test conditions, 5; under partial prescribed test conditions, 1; without prescribed conditions, 10; total failures, 16; total number of plates exposed, 25. These numbers are all too small for reliable mathematical analysis; but as a photographer in a gallery can usually take at least four times as many pictures in the same length of time, and as our whole investigation was crowded into a single week, by his long delay in beginning it, and his abrupt closing of it, the committee is not responsible for that deficiency.

To make the details of the results obtained intelligible, it will be necessary first to state the objects of the investigation and its principles. It was not the object to detect jugglers' tricks in a process allowing so much room for legerdemain; but, the negativ once taken and fixed, there is no further room for fraud, and our object was to determin from the negativ itself the cause of the existence upon it of extraneous faces. If the proof showed that they must hav been produced by the actual presence of faces radiating actinic light, although invisible, spiritual photography would be demonstrated to be a verity. On the other hand, if it showed that all these extraneous faces might hav been produced by other means which we could specify and explain, it would only show that all the results produced by Mr. Keeler in our presence were fraudulent. We had, therefore, the additional object of preparing and explaining such tests as can hereafter be applied in other cases, thus to prevent the public from being deluded by such shallow devices as marking the plates, etc., which afford no more security than locking the front door while the back door stands wide open.

MR. PARKHURST'S PRELIMINARY EXPLANATION.

The recent challenge to investigate, made in the name of a professional Spiritual photographer, and the part I took in that investigation, hav led to results which it seems appropriate to lay before your readers. It may be interesting to inquire (1) what tests are suited to such an investigation, and (2) what means there are for determining from an inspection of a negativ as to the means by which it was produced.

There are only two possible ways of producing an image upon a sensitiv plate: a, by the camera—i. e., at a distance from the object, by means of rays brought to a focus upon the plate, by refraction or by reflection; and b, by contact with the object, as in printing from a transparency.

There are only three possible times for the production of extraneous faces upon a negativ: c, at the time of the sitting; d, previous to the sitting; and e, after the sitting.

The combination of these results in six classes of possible modes, which may be tabulated as follows:

	At time of sitting.	Before it.	After it.
By the camera	ac	ad	ae
By a transparency	bc	bd	be

Of these, ac must include any genuin spirit faces; and it is so easy to exclude ad, ae, and be that in an investigation the practical question is whether bc or bd, both of which are convenient, are resorted to. The medium may insist that unless he handles the plates himself the conditions will be unfavorable, and may thus hav the opportunity for bc, putting a positiv transparency into the plate-holder with the plate. Or if the plates brought by the investigator and carefully marked by him are left for a few minutes where the medium or a confederate can impress them by the method bd, while perhaps the investigator is carefully watching a substituted box, it will be safe to allow him to take the exposed plate from the holder and develop it himself. If no opportunity is afforded for either of these, the medium is as much disappointed as the sitter at finding no spirit face upon the negativ.

The scientific investigation of the problem does not consist in watching for the detection of feats of legerdemain. It consists in imposing conditions which will demonstrate, when an extraneous face is produced, some fact with regard to the manner of its production. Marking the plates is usually worse than useless, because the security it givs is deceptiv. Among the tests which may be usefully applied are the following:

1. The rope test. A rope is placed across in front of the sitter. This will detect bd, by showing the image across the rope.
2. Throwing the sitter out of focus. If the spirit face is in focus, this detects either bc or bd.
3. Partially drawing the slide. This detects bd.
4. Taking a stereoscope. This could only show solid if prepared more elaborately than could readily be accomplished.
5. Developing before exposure detects bd.
6. Requesting the spirit to lay its hand upon the head of the sitter. If the spirit has as much courtesy as our friends in life usually hav, and is desirous of manifesting its presence, this givs an opportunity.
7. Turning the plate. As a scientific test, this is the best of all. In at least nine cases out of ten the spirit face accords in position with the sitter. In most of the exceptional cases it is merely leaning forward. But either bc or bd will giv a spirit face out of adjustment with the sitter. If there are four positions in which the plate may be placed, on the average only one out of four of the extraneous faces will correspond with the sitter, if produced by either bc or bd. The positions of the plate should be determined by chance, and the record should giv these positions and the resulting positions of the extraneous faces. By the time a dozen extraneous faces are produced, the question will be sufficiently settled so far as that medium is concerned.

If a revolving back camera can be secured, so that twelve positions can be made instead of four, and so that the turning can be done after the plate-holder is in the camera, the medium needs no watching; he may use his own plates, and put the plates into the camera and take them out and develop them as he pleases. All that he can do is to suppress a result, by the fogging or destruction of a plate; and he could not thus destroy any large proportion without its proving fraud. On the other hand, suppose that all the twelve faces occur in the position of the sitter, within an angle not exceeding thirty degrees. The chances of coincidence in each case would be one out of twelve, making for all twelve cases a chance of only one out of about 8,910,000,000,000; and an unbelieving Thomas could by additional trials multiply this number indefinitly, leaving no opportunity whatever for fraud, provided the test is properly applied.

Next, as to the investigation of the plates. The only effect that can be produced upon a plate by light is a black deposit, as it becomes after development. The whole image, in the method bd, consists of black or plus deposit. On the other hand, the only effect a transparency can hav, inserted between the plate and the sitter, is to intercept light and prevent deposit, making what may be called minus deposit. It is usually evident that certain faces are wholly of plus and others wholly of minus deposit. Such extraneous faces are almost certainly fraudulent, and to the skilled photographer such evidence needs no corroboration.

Sometimes the direction of the lighting of the spirit face will be found to correspond with that of the sitter, and sometimes not. Genuin results would follow some rule.

No two original negativs can be alike. It is too much trouble to prepare transparencies to use them but once; so that the same faces would be likely to appear upon different pictures judiciously distributed. If some of these spirit faces could be published and widely circulated, perhaps the duplicates could be found.

The claim to hav taken pictures in a closed camera needs but little comment. It is not impossible that spirits may materialize about the size of a pea, outside of the lens, and use rays many times as refrangible as ordinary actinic rays. It is not impossible that they materialize an opaque screen across the inside of the camera, with a lens of less than two inches focus in it. It is not impossible that they may materialize in a flat plane, exactly upon the surface of the plate. It is not impossible that they may draw their own likenesses with a brush dipped in some substance producing the effect of actinic light. But all these possibilities of the imagination are so absurd as to be ridiculous; and I hav therefore omitted to include them among the possibilities given in my table.

The following description of the results of the third meeting was furnished to us by Mr. Parkhurst, who supervised the tests, and it appears to be corroborated by our examination of the negativs.

THE RESULTS OF THE TESTS.

Before the committee was formed I stated to Mr. Robinson that if Mr. Keeler would take a stereoscope of him, and if a spirit face should appear upon the negativ, manifestly within the range of his vision, it would be a far better test than any of the numerous photographs he showed me; and urged him to furnish such a negativ, lending him a camera for that purpose, to assist me in convincing persons nominated upon the committee that it would not be an utter waste of time to attend. That negativ was never furnished. Yet I did not ask that it should be taken as one of my tests, because, after a month's time for preparation, it would not hav been impracticable for him to produce a stereoscope by the same methods by which other faces could be produced.

1. In preparing for the first plate, a dark and figured silk handkerchief was drawn across in front of the sitter, to take the place of the rope test. This was continued for three plates. But it was so strongly illuminated as to print with a dense deposit, instead of clear glass, as I intended, and this destroyed its value as a test in the only instance where it would hav been of service. Indeed, it was chiefly intended as a mask to cover the principal test relied upon, for the first trial, by enabling me to focus the camera definitly upon an object nearer than the sitter, so as to put the camera out of focus for the sitter or any spirits beyond the handkerchief. This furnished two tests for previous printing, and one for simultaneous printing. No result except this, that, it being apparent that such distinct spirit faces as had appeared upon three out of four of the previous negativs would betray their fraudulent character if the camera were out of focus, and there being a probability of the repetition of that test at any time during the session, there was not produced, during the whole session of four hours, a single spirit face distinct enough to be betrayed by that test.

2. The same was repeated with the slide partially drawn. This added a third test for previous printing, continuing the test for simultaneous printing. No spirit faces. Mr. Robinson subsequently submitted to the committee a negativ, where the slide had been partially drawn, but the spirit face was manifestly printed by the simultaneous process, which this test was not expected to affect.

3. It was my intention to repeat this test for both methods, but just then a gentleman, well-known among Spiritualists, entered the room with his wife, neither of them having before ever seen the spirit photographs, and she was invited to be the sitter for the third picture. Leaving the handkerchief in position as the only test, I suspended, for this trial, the complete test for both methods. There appeared upon the plate, after development, an extraneous face wholly of plus deposit, indicating previous printing, but it was too vague to show whether it was intercepted by the handkerchief or not.

4. The same repeated, but with the check upon simultaneous printing that I developed the plate myself, carefully searching, before the development, for a positiv in the plate-holder, which might be of glass, or of mica, or a mere black impression upon the sensitiv film, which might be washed off unnoticed in the development. As no spirit faces were produced, of course my search was unsuccessful.

5. I asked that the spirit should place its hand upon the head of the sitter. This was modified upon the suggestion of those present, and the request was made that the arm of the spirit should be placed around the sitter's neck. There was no response. Subsequently Mr. Robinson submitted to us a negativ showing a spirit hand purporting to be placed upon the sitter's head. It was awkwardly placed, and, besides, the whole value of the test consisted in the production of the result without any opportunity for previous preparation.

6. The usual time of the session was now so nearly over that I applied my last and best test, by turning the camera on the side. No spirit face appeared upon the plate.

Two hours had now elapsed; I had tried every test I cared to try. In every case there had been an utter failure to produce any spirit face, and, therefore, no positiv conclusion could be drawn from those tests. On the third plate alone, where I had interrupted my complete tests, was there the appearance of a spirit face, and that so vague that the partial test remaining could not afford any decisiv result. The medium and the spirits had had every opportunity to afford us positiv proofs, and I devoted the rest of the session mainly to the effort to get spirit faces which should tell their own story.

7. I put the plate into the plate-holder myself, and in front of it I put a glass plate upon which I had drawn a large comet. Of course there was no opportunity for the simultaneous printing of a spirit face. But upon development there appeared a spirit face of plus deposit, indicating previous printing, which partially showed through the sitter's shoulder, as well as my comet in white. Knowing that the plate might hav been previously printed, I turned it several times, in order that such impressed picture might stand an even chance of appearing inverted; but it did not.

8. The same was repeated; no result excepting the comet.

9. The same was again repeated. I also put a small slip of red paper between the plates, to cut off the actinic light entirely from that portion of the plate. The result was a spirit face, very vague, of plus deposit, indicating previous printing. The hair and part of the dress are light, but careful examination shows that this is the effect of the contrast with a cloudy, fog-like surrounding impressed upon the plate at the same time. This is confirmed by its being perceptible not only over a portion of the face of the sitter, but also over a portion of the space covered by the red paper, which would hav remained entirely clear had there been no previous impression upon the plate. On the other hand, I repeated the turning of the plate in putting it into the holder, but still did not succeed in inverting the spirit face, although there were three chances to one of its being inverted at least once in the two trials.

10, 11, and 12. No tests were applied. We had been invited to leave the room, to see if they could not be more successful. On 10 and 11 extraneous faces were produced by simultaneous printing, but so vague as to be hardly discernible. On 12 not even the sitter appeared.

To recapitulate, in the five opportunities for the spirits to manifest themselvs under complete test conditions, there was nothing upon the plate additional to the sitter. Up to No. 9, with the exception of the third plate, the method of simultaneous printing was tested every time, that being the method exclusivly employed at the previous sessions; and in those eight tests not one spirit face appeared having minus deposit, indicating simultaneous printing. A reason for this change of process is apparent. At the first and second session stress was laid upon marking and watching the plates, and no attention was paid to the plate-holder. It was easier then to print by the simultaneous method, upon which marking and watching the plates was no check. It was because we found that he did not print at those sessions in any instance by the previous method that we abandoned the test of developing plates suspected of this previous printing, before they had been used for a sitting. But at the last session, the previous printing was much the safer method, as there was much less danger of our wishing to develop a plate before exposure than after exposure.

Mr. Robinson submitted to us negativs and prints, taken under conditions entirely unknown to us.

One of these was intended to illustrate what is called the spirit light surrounding some of the faces. These faces were evidently produced by previous printing, and instead of surrounding the face on the transparency with black glass, it was surrounded with clear glass vignetted into black. The dark surrounding upon the negativ produced the spirit light. But we noticed in several cases that the vignetting was imperfectly done, and a definit border of the background could be easily seen, especially where the background was thin.

Others were intended as illustrations of the recognition of spirit faces. It would hav been impossible for Mr. Keeler, in most cases, to prove that he never had had an opportunity to copy those faces. In one case it was said that but one negativ had ever been taken of the party identified, and her face was shown upon three spirit pictures. There was no indication that they were not identical, although so vague that we could not positivly assert that they were; but it was noticeable that there was no apparent difference in the position of the face thus repeated. When we remember that a lively imagination can see likenesses everywhere; can see the same cloud as like a camel, a weasel, or "very like a whale," it is not surprising that in such vague spirit faces resemblances should be recognized to persons who had died ten or twenty years before. Had evidence been offered us of a recognized likeness to a person whose picture had never come into Mr. Keeler's possession, inquiry into the facts would hav involved a doubtful and laborious examination of facts of a nature entirely foreign to our investigation.

In one negativ, a cane held by the sitter passes directly over a spirit face, evidently produced in the camera; and where the cane crosses the mouth, eye, and hair, where there was interpolated deposit on the transparency, the cane is nearly obliterated; while it is only partially obscured in passing across the portions of the face which were nearly transparent upon the interpolated positiv.

There was placed in our hands one negativ bearing characteristics entirely different. At each side of the sitter, and a little behind, is a standing full-length spirit form draped in white. The dress of the sitter was dark. On the negativ the spirit dresses are dark, and the sitter's dress nearly transparent. Now, the spirit dress could not hav been produced by previous printing, because the dark deposit is sharply cut off by the sitter's dress, and it would be impossible for the absence of light from the sitter's dress to remove a deposit already upon the plate. On the other hand, the spirit dress could not hav been produced by an interpolated transparency, because that would hav made it lighter than the background, whereas the background is nearly transparent. It is the unanimous opinion of the committee that this negativ was produced from actual figures standing near the sitter. It is not our province to inquire whether they were spiritual or material forms. But it forcibly suggests the consideration that a genuin spirit form would be almost certain to hav these same decisiv characteristics separating it absolutely from the characteristics of plus and minus printing already described. It would hardly be possible that a genuin spirit face should appear near the sitter without there being some lines which it would be absolutely certain could not be explained by either mode of printing. If genuin, it ought not to require study; it ought to be so evident that we could not imagin the explanation of either plus or minus deposit.

In conclusion, we wish to emphasize the following points:

Mr. Robinson offered to hav Mr. Keeler produce for us "spirit photographs," and to convince us that they were not made by ordinary photographic methods, but by genuin spirit agencies. But

I. He and Mr. Keeler furnished us no evidence that they were not made by ordinary methods.

II. For reasons already detailed, we could secure no reliable arrangements to obtain such evidence.

III. We did not deem it wise or judicious, under the circumstances, to attempt to prevent or detect the use of prepared plates.

IV. We were therefore obliged to rely mainly upon an examination of the nine negativs themselvs for internal evidence as to their origin.

V. They are all such as can easily be produced by processes well known to photographers.

VI. Three of them bear the marks of previous preparation by contact printing with a positiv transparency.

VII. Six of them bear the marks of being made by the simultaneous process, or interception of light during the exposure by a transparent positiv placed in the holder, or in the camera, in front of the sensitiv plate.

VIII. No spirit face could be recognized by either of us.

Neither kind of evidence, external or internal, having been furnished us, we must report their spirit origin not proven.

We trust that (1) by calling attention to the peculiar characteristics of "spirit faces" produced by means of transparent positivs either by previous (or plus) printing, or by simultaneous (or minus) printing; (2) by pointing out the differences between the two; (3) and by using these characteristics and differences as evidence of the real origin of the "spirit faces," we hav done better service than if we had attempted successfully either to prevent or to detect the use of prepared plates.

Ho! For Montana.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On the 17th of last April the chairman of the Executiv Committee of the Secular Union for Montana wrote to me in regard to permanent lecture work in that territory. From all accounts, the Christian church imagins it owns Montana. I will go and dispute the title. The Presbyterian Assembly in Minneapolis claimed that they had a strong hold there. If the Montana ministers hav as much grit as grace, there will be lively times there this fall and winter. It is my purpose to confine my lectures to Montana for several months if there are Liberals enough there to sustain the work. I start to-morrow, and will be employed for several weeks lecturing on the route, and will be glad to hav the Montana Liberals address me at Wentworth, Dakota, and my mail will be forwarded to me on the way.

I hav just closed my debate with Rev. V. O. Van Slyke, of Wisconsin. It occupied four evenings in the Opera House, at Madison, Dakota. The reverend gentleman is a well-meaning man, but truth and candor compel me to say that he is the weakest opponent that I ever met; and that makes it uncomplimentary for him, for the reason that I remember my debate with Whitcomb, and the one with Elder Grubbs, of Kentucky, and the Methodist parson, Hodgkiss. It always does me good to acknowledge the talent of any man. Christianity has a few good debaters, and but a few. Among them are Rev. James Pryse, whom I place at the head; Rev. G. C. Haddock, Rev. O. A. Burgess (deceased), Rev. D. R. Dungan, Rev. D. R. Lucas. It is a pleasure to debate with a man of ability. It does far more good to the Liberal cause, for the reason that if a weak reasoner gets swamped the Christians invariably charge their defeat to their champion, while, if their system is defended by a man of ability, the damaging facts against them stand out in bold relief. The thinking portion of the people perceive how utterly indefensible the claims of Christianity really are.

I regret to say that the Christians of Madison almost wholly abandoned my opponent to his fate. They showed him very little brotherly sympathy. There was one clergyman present on two evenings. There was a Presbyterian ice-cream festival on the last night of the debate, and he probably enjoyed that better.

Three nights out of the four, several loads of Liberals came from Wentworth. In fact, the principal part of our audience was from Wentworth, eight miles away. Here is where I hav done so much lecturing within the past two years. The people of Wentworth are a live, wide-awake, educated, progressiv people, full of Western energy, and, as might be expected, they are Liberals, financially and mentally. No place of its size ever paid me better for my services. It would make my letter too lengthy to giv you the names of all the Freethinkers here. There is Mr. W. L. Horton, the president of the League. He is a whirlwind of enterprise, clear-headed, practical, uncompromising, hated and feared by the church. He never quails, and is always in the front of the battle for Freethought. Would that we had one such in every town. Then there are the numerous members of the Zimmermann families, the Clauders, the Wentworths, quiet but effectiv workers all. Wentworth has an excellent brass band. Its music these summer evenings has made one think of city life. Now we move toward Montana.

The Cincinnati Delusion.

Anyone who has access to a daily newspaper must hav read during the past ten days of the sect of so-called Perfectionists having their headquarters at Walnut Hills, in Cincinnati, Ohio; and if THE TRUTH SEEKER laid claim to the gift of prophecy it might "point with pride" to its remark last week that some unusual developments with regard to the doings of this sect were to be expected in the near future. The Cincinnati Enquirer has been paying its attention to the matter, and has brought out all that was expected, and a good deal more than could be desired. The investigation was doubtless instigated by the older established religious sects, whose followers hav been drawn from their former places of worship by the new craze.

The sect of Perfectionists is about a year old. It had its origin in the Christian belief in the incarnation of the deity in man. In the present instance the incarnation or second Christ is a woman, Mrs. John P. Martin. Her sister, a Mrs. Brooke, believes herself to be he Holy Ghost made visible in the flesh. Quite a number of adherents hav been attracted to these two women, among them many reputable men and women, old and young, married and single, and of all beliefs except that of unbelief. The Methodists hav perhaps contributed the most largely to make up the Perfectionist band.

Meetings hav recently been held weekly, sometimes nightly—never in the daytime—and the character of the doings at them can be readily guessed by those who know what to expect from religious gatherings where reason is thrown to one side, and the emotions, if not the passions, are in control. The details are salacious and cannot be more than hinted at.

The theory of the Perfectionists is that they are made over anew, and renovated something after the orthodox plan, with this difference, that while orthodoxy merely rids the convert of the old body which has sinned, Perfectionism promises the same, and supplements the process with a new body incapable of sinning or being defiled. That which is sin in the unregenerate leaves no stain upon the Perfectionist. All contact is spiritual and therefore innocent. Nature then is allowed to take its course with the usual results. As the details of the meetings hav yielded more and more to investigation, the sisters hav been progressivly described as "attractiv," "magnetic," and "voluptuous." They conduct their services with a high hand, and the faithful must fall down and worship them. Mariolatry might be another name for it if Mary were on earth.

The Enquirer has not been satisfied with a mere exposure of the present state of affairs, but has searched the records of the women, and laid it open with unsparing hand. The intricacies of the relations which sister-in-law has sustained with brother-in-law surpasses anything in the Parson Downs or Sir Charles Dilke scandals. Perhaps the Oneida Communists, in the palmy days of John Noyes, came nearest to furnishing a parallel. The Enquirer may hav done the public a service in placing it all before the world. If so, we are willing that that paper should enjoy the public's undivided thanks for the good work done.

It is the province of THE TRUTH SEEKER to view the affair in its religious aspect, for in religion these immoralities hav their source. The seeds of the fanaticism were sown by the Christian superstition, and upon that superstition falls the odium. The blame cannot be laid at the door of the advocates of "loose divorce laws," nor to the "growing spirit of Infidelity and disregard of Christian morals." It cannot even be shuffled off upon the shoulders of "freelovers." We turn the Perfectionist craze over to the Christian alienists to deal with according to their best knowledge of religious dementia. If the Cincinnati lunatics serve to shake the faith of these gentlemen in the infallibility of the religious emotions as a guide, to the exclusion of reason, Mrs. Martin's claim to being a savior will, in a sense, be made good.

Chicago Secular News.

His Holiness Archbishop Feehan, Spiritual Prince of Illinois, by the grace of the Pope of Rome Ruler of the City of Chicago and County of Cook, is a world-famed philanthropist, and to do him homage the city and county officials invariably feel it a precious privilege to fall at his feet, ready to execute his every behest. Did we not send a special train, with our civic and judicial authorities, including the mayor and our "best citizens," to meet him en route from Rome? And did not the most imposing pageant seen here for years tramp through the muddy streets, to the music of many bands, on the Sunday of his arrival in the Garden City, as the representativ of him who was content to ride bare-back on a jackass? Certainly! Chicago is just that far ahead of Jerusalem, and there is nothing too good for an archbishop, especially Feehan.

At Desplaines, now known as Feehanville, is situated the enduring monument of his far-seeing benevolence—the Catholic training-school for boys. The site occupies many acres, the buildings are ample, and the portion devoted to the priestly jailers even luxuriant. Allow me to mention that there is nothing sectarian about this institution, so I am informed by one of the directors. This is one of those long-felt public needs, where boys can be taken and committed to the institution when having no means of support, or when found guilty of petty offenses, and thus taken from the contamination of older jail-birds and brought under proper influences and disciplin. That these priests would be guilty of using this institution for sectarian purposes is not to be thought of. Oh, no!

On this account it has drawn thousands of dollars from the pockets of pretended Protestants, some of whom are noted in the pork-packing or stock-broking domain. There is a growing disposition on the part of our "solid men" to cultivate a closer acquaintance with the Romish church, as the press is harping about the workingmen of that faith being more law-abiding and submissiv. As the Tribune editorially deplores this lack of submission among workingmen in general to their "masters," that is the desideratum now sought, and if Catholic training can inculcate "submission," it will certainly be a larger sharer of their bounty.

As previously stated, the financial and personal status of our County Board is strained, and on that account Commissioner Klehm makes a vigorous "kick" against the claim of that institution for the past quarter.

Brother Leo, superintendent of the training-school, presented a bill for $3,060 "for board, tuition and clothing, etc.," of boys received during the last three months by warrants from the County Court. Commissioner Klehm says the bills are in excess of what that institution is entitled to, according to the statutes, by about $1.000 per quarter.

I hav tried hard to get at the true inwardness of this non-sectarian Catholic institution twice during my residence in Chicago, but it seems to be a closed book. The general educational law of the state prohibits the use of public moneys for any but non-sectarian institutions; but there are always some special laws passed to exempt this or that institution from its operation, so that it is more favored in the breach than the observance. As those boys were only received during the quarter, many must hav had very little board, tuition or clothing, but there is no knowing how much et cetera was necessary for the control of their conduct and the good of their souls.

Having made extra endeavors to find how much the city and county pay per capita for the boys, I succeeded in being sent from pillar to post on this wild-goose chase, and everywhere greeted with the same question: "What do you want with it?" I am going to get that information yet, if it is at all come-at-able, for I am satisfied that there's a "mare's nest" in Feehanville. This "benevolent" institution draws money from the United States for the education of Indian wards; it also has received help from the state, and lays the city and county under tribute to its powerful influence, besides collecting large sums on account of its non-sectarian basis; and, best of all, is entitled to all the products of the handiwork of those boys from the time they enter until they are 21 years of age. When we remember that it pays no taxes, as a religious institution, you can form a slight idea of the thriving Catholic manufactory we hav in our midst. The non-sectarian feature of this model reform school is simply this—the boys are asked when entering if they hav any objection to attending Catholic services. If they do object, their pious jailers will soon be able to overcome those scruples, and their existence is made a little more tolerable.

The City Council concluded its labors for the summer by unanimously passing an ordinance requiring that all street parades must hav police sanction, so that the police can prohibit any procession. One of our papers, commenting on it, said:

> Permission should be withheld if, in the opinion of the police department, the thoroughfares would be unduly blocked by inordinate use of the same by a marching body. There is now little reason to apprehend that the red flag will again be waved in the streets of Chicago. That symbol has had its day. The department will not be burdened with requests for authority to raise that standard. It went down in the Haymarket, never to be reared in this community again.

A little more of Russian rule in Chicago. Of course, the ordinance is aimed at the Socialistic element of workingmen. On Sunday and Monday the Tribune demanded that the mayor use the ordinance to suppress a meeting called for Monday evening in Twelfth-street Turner Hall, for the purpose of expressing indignation at the continued misrepresentations of the press, especially their garbled reports of cross-examinations in the Anarchists' trial now in progress. That law-abiding sheet intimated that if the ordinance did not quite cover the suppression of indoor meetings, public opinion would. It said in Sunday's issue:

> Emboldened, apparently, by the immunity enjoyed so far, the Central Labor Union—of which the Carpenters' Union is the leading society—has called a meeting for to-morrow evening at West Twelfth-street Turner Hall to criticise the conduct of the trial of the Anarchists, and probably to denounce the presiding judge, the witnesses for the state, and the attorneys for the prosecution. It is proposed, doubtless, to intimidate the court by a display of numbers—perhaps by threats. Parsons, Spies, and Fielden cannot be there. Neebe can. There will be no lack of orators, as an announcement in the Arbeiter-Zeitung, the Anarchists' organ, promises. It would not be at all surprising if there were incitements to those assembled to march on the court and blow it up with dynamite. The bombs hidden away last May may be brought from their hiding-places.
> The mayor of the city ought to take measures to prevent this meeting, which can hardly fail to be of an incendiary character.

Monday's issue was still more rampant, but of the same tenor as the above.

I attended the meeting, having promised to take the chair if no one else could be found to accept the doubtful honor, as the chances for being summarily dealt with were so good that few appeared willing to serve. My aversion to unnecessary prominence arose from my Secular associations. Well, the meeting was a grand success, and the speeches were cheered to the echo. The following were unanimously adopted:

> WHEREAS, It is the boast of our jurisprudence that no man shall be condemned until he be fully heard in his own defense, and his guilt established beyond a reasonable doubt by credible testimony, the law presuming the accused innocent until guilt is established; and
> WHEREAS, All inquiries of this nature are unavoidably affected in some measure by general public sentiment; and
> WHEREAS, The press is the chief instrumentality in modern civilization for the formation and expression of public opinion; and
> WHEREAS, In the pending trial the press has, with almost entire unanimity, from the 4th day of May, 1886, until now denounced the defendants as guilty, and clamored for their condemnation and execution, although they hav not yet been heard in their own defense, and has not fairly and fully published the evidence thus far adduced in the trial, particularly the cross-examination of the witnesses called by the prosecution; therefore
> Resolved, That we declare the course of the press to be contrary to the spirit of the law and to the dictates of justice, and alike calculated and designed to do the accused a great wrong by misleading the public and withholding from it all means of forming a correct estimate of information upon the issues involved in this trial; that we believe it the duty of the press to publish the testimony in full without comment, or at least to print a fair and impartial abstract of the whole testimony alike, that favorable to, with that supposed to be against, the prisoners.
> And we recommend to the organized workers of Chicago to follow in the footsteps of the Central Labor Union of New York, which is entering the arena of political action for the purpose of counteracting the repressiv legislation that the capitalistic class will no doubt attempt to railroad through our legislativ bodies.

The old Socialistic party, which was left in the shade when Anarchism became the rage, is likely to revive for political work this fall. A conference with that end in view will be held next Sunday.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG is lecturing to crowded houses in Nebraska.

THE Bozeman, Mont., Avant-Courier says: "S. P. Putnam was greeted with a large and apprcciativ audience on Sunday night last, and if close attention, interrupted only by frequent rounds of applause, indicate anything, nearly all present felt that they were enjoying a rare intellectual treat and more than compensated for their time and attention. Putnam is a calm, clear-headed liberal thinker, a sound reasoner and an eloquent speaker, and is apparently incapable of giving offense to any person who is an honest, earnest seeker for truth. We regret that want of time and space this week will not permit us to giv even a brief synopsis of his very interesting and logical lecture on 'Universal Mental Liberty.' But as he will lecture at the same place on Sunday night next we advise all thinking persons to go and hear what he has to say on the subject of 'The New Heaven and Earth.' Mr. Putnam does not arrogate to himself the right to coerce anyone into the conclusions of his own reasoning; he simply presents the truth as he understands it, and asks to be heard without bias or prejudice. At the close of the last lecture the hat was passed around for the purpose of raising funds to pay incidental expenses, and the sum of $25 was collected, which, added to former voluntary contributions, raised the amount to $40. This, of course, is a faint index of the liberality of our citizens."

News and Notes.

I lectured on Sunday evening, July 11th, at Bozeman. Although the Methodist conference, with twenty-five or thirty ministers, elders, bishops, etc., was on hand and did its level best to make things lively on the orthodox side, our hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and even some of the clergymen attended, although they did not remain and receive all the good they might. No doubt, however, they carried off as much of the gospel of common sense as was possible under the circumstances.

The Liberal element at Bozeman and vicinity will be reorganized, and will present a solid front, I hope, to the enemy. With such laborers as Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Lindley, Thomas Burke, Judge and Mrs. Lewis, J. V. Bogert, W. W. Alderson, Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Cook, James Gourley, and others, both ladies and gentlemen, I hav great confidence in the work that will be accomplished.

On Tuesday evening, July 13th, I lectured at Helena, in the Opera House, to a large audience. Helena is full of Liberals, but many are afraid to take any open stand. However, I believe there are enough who hav brains and backbone at this important point to bring Liberalism to the front, and destroy the tyranny of the churches. Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Gilpatrick, Prof. Henry C. Yerger and wife, John Horsky, H. W. English, Iver Wolff, C. H. Jeffries, Ed. Busick, H. C. Votaw, and others are generous and devoted friends of the cause, and will keep this frontier line of battle in good order.

Again I had the pleasure of spending a few days with Dr. Whitford and his family at Butte City. I lectured there on Friday evening, July 16th, and I found a most cordial interest among the people. The doctor has been doing some vigorous work. A Secular Union has been organized. Funds hav already been raised for the distribution of Freethought literature. Dr. Whitford will giv a series of lectures on the origin of the Bible and other important topics. Of course there is great opposition among the clergy to this new movement. They recognize the ability enrolled upon our side and fear the result. Dr. Whitford, however, has enlisted for the war. He has drawn the sword and flung the scabbard away. There will be lively times for orthodoxy, and a triumph for Secular principles. Dr. Whitford will be ably assisted by Fred. Cook, who is always ready to giv and work for the cause; E. N. Dunkle and E. F. Dunkle, who were once Methodists, but who hav lost none of their enthusiasm by coming into the church of humanity; Charles Stoffel, whose heart and hand are always ready for what makes mankind free; J. C. Singer, a generous contributor to the work, and others. I expect great things in this metropolitan camp-ground.

I lectured again at Dillon Sunday afternoon and evening to crowded houses. This time I was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Eastman, and the wandering pilgrim could find no more delightful entertainment. They hav organized a Secular Union here with nearly fifty names. Established on a broad and democratic basis, without doubt it will be a great power in this growing community where the churches are gradually but surely decaying. I lectured on "American Democracy," and "The Glory of Infidelity." A brilliant feature in connection with the lectures was the music furnished by Mr. and Mrs. Carrington and that bright little Liberal, Percy Carrington, their son. Thus the rugged pathway of reform is becoming beautiful. Poetry and music are our aids to the world's intellectual advancement. After the lectures friends made a pleasant social entertainment, and we had a real Sunday night's festival, which is the best religious service the human heart can hav, where every moment is jeweled with joy. Mr. Robert Boyd, Will Coddington, Mr. Estes, Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. Eastman made a very good choir. Mr. Coddington professes to belong to the Methodist church and he gave us plenty of Methodist zeal; and, as Liberals take in all that is good, we took that also, rendered as it was in handsome musical fashion. Dillon people know how to cultivate the humanitarian spirit, and this will be an element of power in their Freethought work.

Some of the good pioneers of this country came twenty-five or thirty miles to hear these lectures. We really had a kind of Liberal convention on this Sunday, when nature gave us her brightest smiles—mingled with a little rain—just enough to make the weather pleasant. Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Trostle, Mr. and Mrs. Joe Pennington, and others, were present from Twin Bridges. There is quite a settlement of Liberals in that part of the county, and the preachers don't find much encouragement there.

It was a real treat to meet our stanch friend, Ameda Busette, of Bannack, who has done more for the advancement of Liberal ideas in this county than anyone else. He is a man of first-rate intellectual culture. He has read and mastered our best books. He knows the history of the church, and few Christians are better posted on Bible facts and texts. He has spent hundreds of dollars in the dissemination of Freethought books, papers, etc. He is also an able exponent of our views, and the ministers had better not tackle him in debate. For over twenty-five years he has kept the battle a-going, and much of the present success of our movement here is the result of his untiring efforts. I also enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. Benj. Dettmer and wife and her sister, who are all good Freethinkers. Mr. Dettmer subscribed for The Truth Seeker, Investigator, and Ironclad Age, and bought quite a library of books, all of which will be kept busy as campaign documents. Mr. Dettmer is always on the move. He likes a new country, and expects to go to Alaska. If he does, the banners of Liberalism will be uplifted there, and I presume the secretary will hav to go and deliver some lectures and build a Freethought hall in advance of the churches.

I am very sorry to say that our gallant captain, Emerick, was almost sick abed when I arrived, but for all that he came to both the lectures. I don't believe he would hav got up if Gabriel's trump had sounded, but he was bound to be at the lectures, deo volente or non volente. I was glad to see him again, and his noble wife and others, too—an inspiring company of earnest men and women; Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Blivens, Mr. and Mrs. Estes, C. L. Thompson, George Dart, G. W. Carter, and others. They are talking of building a Freethought Hall at Dillon, and Mr. Emerick has promised to giv $1,000 to the erection of such a temple of Humanity.

So I leave Montana with high hopes, and look forward to a renewal of the campaign next winter with pleasant anticipations, for without doubt there will be a territorial convention of the Montana Liberals at Butte City the coming season. The work must now be pushed forward, for a very great interest has been aroused. A movement is on foot to secure for Montana the services of our eloquent friend, W. F. Jamieson. I hope this will be successful, for it will add greatly to the strength of our cause. Dr. York has already done valuable work in Butte, Helena, and Bozeman. Everywhere, however, do I meet the waves of inspiration that are still in the air, and still thrill the heart, flowing from the glorious eloquence of our president, Colonel Ingersoll, who was here two summers ago, and was greeted with crowded houses. I hardly meet a Liberal but he tells me of having heard on these occasions our great orator, and the desire is expressed deep and wide in all this western country to listen to that marvelous voice again. Our good colonel is enthroned, indeed, in the affections of the people of the West. They believe in him and admire him with all their heart. Sure I am that I never could hav met with so cordial a reception and generous appreciation if Ingersoll had not already aroused the sympathies and thoughts of these people with his earnest speech. The remembrance of his work has made my path a pleasant one indeed.

Several hundred miles' travel, and I leave Idaho and Montana behind in the glory of the setting sun, and strike Ogden once more.

Here my good friend William J. Jones meets me, and takes me over to his home in the pretty Weber valley. Friend Jones was once in the hands of Brigham Young, because he would not submit to the authority of the Prophet. Close by his homestead are the bluffs where Brigham Young planted his cannon and killed twenty or thirty of the Morrisites, who, unarmed, were huddled together in a school-house—which still stands near the road I traveled. The Morrisites were thus butchered because they chose another leader and teacher by the name of Morris, in place of Brigham. This is a specimen of that Mormon brotherhood, coöperation, liberty, etc., for which Dyer Lum has such an affectionate admiration. Of course the testimony of friend Jones, and of hundreds of other men and women who know by practical experience what Mormonism has done, is of no value to Lum, because they are the "avowed enemies" of Mormonism. According to Lum's logic, he who opposes Mormonism is a liar, and he who criticises its institutions is "prejudiced" and "illiberal"—a new kind of logic. Upon what has Mormonism and Dyer Lum fed that they hav become so great as to be above dissent? I am simply astonished that any man who is in favor of individual liberty should sustain Mormonism, which is a barbaric despotism, opposed to personal freedom, founded on superstition and ignorance, and whose history is one of the bloodiest and most cruel in the annals of time. Lum's Liberalism is what I call fool-Liberalism, and is the result of too much heart or too little brain. Dyer Lum will please take notice that I hav not attacked the morals of the Mormon people; I hav only attacked the institution. As a people, the Mormons are like the rest of mankind; they are neither better nor worse. As individuals, I respect them; it is the church tyranny that I oppose with every fiber of my being.

Friend Jones has a big house, and a big hall in it, and I gave my lecture there. After the lecture there was music, vocal and instrumental, dancing, and a good time generally. The welcome back to Utah was quite encouraging. Friends were present from Ogden, Hooper, Kaysville, etc.: Hector Haight and wife, Dr. Ingram and wife, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Simpson, Mr. and Mrs. James Horrocks, Robert Wilson, John A. Jost, L. Thompson, John Bowman, Thomas Peek, M. Hendry, T. H. Hodson, the Lamberts, and others.

I spent the night with John Bowman, who is one of the old settlers of this valley. He also has had to fight the priesthood, but would not giv in. Like General Taylor, he never knew when he was whipped, but stayed right along through thick and thin.

On Wednesday morning I went over to Uintah Station. I met here Chas. De La Baunie, a gentleman of superior intelligence, whose father was a general in the French army, and he himself has had the training of the best military schools of France. He was brought up in the church. He is now a Freethinker. It was a pleasure to meet with one so scholarly, and who has so thoroughly read the best Freethought literature.

At Peterson Station, about noon, as I stepped from the train, I received a cordial grasp of hand from L. P. Edholm, one of the first Freethinkers of Morgan county. I went to his home and found a good rest from the summer's heat and dust. In the evening I lectured at the school-house at Milton to a large and attentiv audience. I was pleased to meet again the friends of my former trip, Dan Williams, of Morgan; A. D. Shurtliff, Charles Smith, Jacob Bowman, Ande Ohlsen, Olive Gerden, Jos. Williams, John Thurston, Ed. Williams, Martin Gorder, A. Paulsen, P. Parkinson, and others.

Thursday I came to Salt Lake. Friday, July 23d, was my birthday, and we had a little picnic in the park. I guess if Brigham Young had known that the park whose groves he planted would hav been used for such a sacrilegious purpose as a Secular festival gathering, he would not hav sold it to the city. However, we had a good time, and the ghost of the Prophet did not haunt us a bit. As I can keep a secret like a woman, I shall not tell how old I am. I feel as young, however, as when I first drew the breath of life. The universe is as bright and my dreams are as glowing as when I went to school. I am just as happy as at the time when, after earning fifty dollars by the sweat of my face, I sat down to the desk and opened my brand-new Virgil or prepared to win academical honors by a discussion of the important question: Resolved, "That the pen is mightier than the sword." When, however, I think of the seminary, and orthodox pulpit, and Liberal ministry, and the Secular pilgrimages, and the immense theological and metaphysical spaces I hav traversed, I feel about a million years of age. It has been a round-about journey, during which God, heaven, and hell hav disappeared like so many sparks, and only the earth remains, and I am a child again on its glowing bosom; and I renounce old age forever, and will die as young as when I was born. This is a paradox of which orthodoxy knows nothing. According to orthodoxy, we are born old—old Adam.

I lecture at Salt Lake to-morrow evening; at Rock Springs, July 29th and 30th; at Greeley, Col., Aug. 1st and 2d; at Longmont, Aug. 3d, 4th, and 5th; at Denver, Aug. 8th and 15th; and at following places if friends see fit to make arrangements: Forks Creek, Aug. 9th and 10th; Central City, Aug. 11th and 12th; Idaho Springs, Aug. 13th and 14th; Georgetown, Aug. 16th and 17th; Plum Creek, Neb., Aug. 19th. I shall be at Seward, Neb., Aug. 21st, 22d, and 23d; at Valley Falls, Kansas, Aug. 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th; Lincoln, Neb., Aug. 29th; Fremont, Aug. 30th and 31st; West Point, Sept. 1st, 2d, and 3d; Omaha, Sept. 5th; Cromwell, Iowa, Sept. 7th and 8th; Leon, Sept. 9th and 10th; Ottumwa, Sept. 12th; West Union, Sept. 14th, 15th, and 16th; Chebanse, Ill., Sept. 18th and 19th; Chicago, Sept. 26th; West Union, Ohio, Sept. 28th, 29th, and 30th. I find the field constantly opening, and it is impossible to meet all demands for lectures this season.

Facts About the New Testament.

The gospel of the Infancy was according to the "original." But who knows about the "original?" Here lies the difficulty; there is too much according. We know nothing about the writings of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. We only know that some unknown persons wrote according to these reputed authors.

What a pity the wonderful gospel of the Infancy could not hav been voted the word of God! If the few tame miracles recorded in the New Testament are to be taken as evidence of the word of God, the wonderful miracles recorded in this gospel would not hav left a doubting Thomas in all the land. This gospel lifts the veil and allows us to look back to an age when every man of any consideration was writing gospels and working miracles—when sacred writings and miracles were the order of the day.

The age that produced such untold numbers of miracle-workers also swarmed with gospel-writers. The new doctrin of the Christian religion occupied the public mind, and everybody was writing about it, and each one told his story in his own way.

If the gospel of the Infancy was genuin and inspired by God, why is it not in the New Testament? If spurious, must not the parts taken from it by Luke and Matthew be spurious too?

Both the gospel of the Infancy and the Protevangelion, from which a portion of the New Testament was taken, are known to be of Eastern origin. The account of the star which guided the wise men from the east is found in the life of Zoroaster and almost in the same language.

The sacred writings of the Hindoos giv an account of a very mysterious character called Chrishna or Krishna, born nearly twelve hundred years before Christ. He was believed to be a God, born of a virgin by miraculous conception.

A chorus of angels saluted the newborn babe; he was of royal descent; had the power of speech when born; was cradled among shepherds; the ruler of the country sought to take his life; the slaughter of the young children was ordered—nearly every circumstance in the life of Krishna corresponding with the account of Christ as given in the New Testament. He performed wonderful miracles in his infancy. He killed a huge serpent which vomited fire, brought the dead to life, and struck others dead who had offended him; and he, like Christ, was crucified to atone for the sins of the world.

In the life of this Eastern savior is found nearly every incident recorded in the life of Christ. The conviction is irresistible that a small portion of the life of Christ was taken from the life of Zoroaster, but in the main it was drawn from the sacred writings of the Hindoos, and the incidents as related in the life of the Eastern savior were slightly varied and made to apply to the life of Christ so as to meet the demands of the new religion. Nearly all the men who hav investigated this matter without bias hav come to about the same conclusion. A faithful account of the origin of the scriptures of the New Testament would prove an eye-opener to most Christians.

Waite says: "The prevailing religious excitement and the enthusiasm, the trusting credulity and love of the marvelous, which were characteristic of the early Christians, led them to accept unhesitatingly whatever came to them sanctioned by their bishops and teachers. When the better educated among them were called upon to translate or transcribe religious writings for the purpose of increasing the volume of religious literature, they made additions more or less extensiv, and this process prevailed extensivly and unreservedly." And he says, further, "This fact must be kept constantly in view in all investigations of Christian doctrin."

Of the one hundred and fifty thousand various readings which Griesback found in the New Testament manuscripts Waite says "probably one hundred and forty-nine thousand were additions and interpolations." All over the land the young are taught that these uncertain, anonymous, and interpolated writings are the word of God. The wickedness of such teaching ought to be exposed. Let all the facts be told; then let the people judge for themselvs. Anything short of this is not honest.

It is only fair when the Christian speaks of the "holy Bible" that he should explain its legendary character, and say frankly that the whole system of the Christian religion has probably been borrowed from other and older systems. And let him not forget when he speaks of "the holy Bible" that there are more than twenty "holy Bibles" extant. And let him be honest enough when he speaks of a "crucified savior" to say, "Our savior is only one of a dozen or more crucified saviors;" and let him be particular to mention the Indian savior Krishna, who was crucified for the sins of the world more than a thousand years before the birth of Christ, and that the whole story of the immaculate conception and resurrection is but a rehash of an Eastern legend.

When the Christian teaches the young that the Bible is the "inspired word of God," let him be honest enough to say that nearly every age and country has produced one. Our country has produced the Mormon Bible, and thousands of the Mormon gulls place the same implicit confidence in it as a "revelation from God" that the Christian does in his "holy Bible."

When he speaks of miracles, let him say frankly that Jesus was no great miracle-worker. The magicians down in Egypt performed greater miracles than Christ ever thought of. His miracles, compared to those of Apollonius, Simon Magus, and Mohammed, were only as a fly-speck compared to a quagmire.

When the Christian talks to the young about the holy prophets, let him tell those whom he attempts to instruct that anciently the science of prophesying was taught by the proficients as astronomy and chemistry are now, and was predicated on the shifting clouds and rising smoke, and upon palmistry and the entrails of animals, and was about as reliable as the medicin-men and rain-makers among the Indian tribes. Let the minister in his sermon and the Sabbath-school teacher in his class mention the fact that for three hundred years from the first century sacred writers were "as plenty as blackberries," and that it took over six hundred years to separate the inspired writings from the spurious, and that now no two agree as to their exact meaning.

At stated times these scriptures hav been amended and revised. And now a "New Version" turns up. Yet all who hav had to do with the "sacred scriptures" hav received their light from "on high;" but for all this Christians are still fighting about their real meaning.

Tell your hearers that all this is not wonderful when it is considered that for three hundred years everybody was writing, tinkering, interpolating, transcribing, or translating these scriptures, and injecting his own peculiar views into them.

Yes, my clerical friends, turn on the light; let us hav the full blaze of the truth. Truth before falsehood; humanity before Christianity; light before darkness; facts before fiction; science before superstition. Giv us the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and may the Lord hav mercy on your never-dying souls.

To show how the story of the immaculate conception has grown, it is only necessary to state that Cerinthus, who wrote a gospel in the year 145, said that "Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary according to the course of ordinary human generation, but that he was more prudent and wise than other men." Carpocrates, who wrote in the year 135, says, "Jesus was the son of Joseph, and just like other men, only that he was steadfast and pure." Papias, who wrote about the middle of the second century, says that "Jesus was crushed by a chariot, and died in that way." Marcion wrote about the year 145, and denied the resurrection of Christ, and accused the other writers of "perverting the gospels."

Thus it will be seen that for a hundred and fifty years after the birth of Christ nothing was known of the immaculate conception, the resurrection, or the miraculous character of Christ.

As we shall see, the miraculous character of Christ was fixed and tempered long afterward, for a purpose which nobody thought about during the life of the great reformer. Neither were the gospels written during his life, nor for more than two hundred years afterward. Many believed that the gospels were written during the life of Christ. Let us see. Justin Martyr, who wrote between the years 150 and 160, nowhere mentions any of the canonical gospels or their supposed authors, showing that the New Testament writings were not in existence in his day.

It would be strange for him to speak minutely of other gospels, and not mention those of the New Testament, if they were in existence. He mentions "The Acts of Pilate" and the gospel of Peter, neither of which is found in the New Testament.

He further says that "Christ and his father were both carpenters, and worked at their trade, making plows and yokes." This is according to the early idea that Christ was a mere man, born like other men, and working like other men.

It would be a strange sight, indeed, to see a God boring the holes in an ox-yoke. It is likely enough that the new doctrin which he preached caused him to be regarded as a great man, and then, like many other great and good men, he was deified.

Then, to be a god he must be born like a god and hav the power of a god. Hence the immaculate conception, the miracles, the resurrection and ascension, became necessary, as an after filling-in, to make all the parts harmonize and dovetail together.

The early writers mention a great many "acts" and "epistles," "gospels," and revelations not found in the New Testament. Many of these writings were held in high esteem by the early churches.

It is well known that Tatian, in the year 170, published a collection of sacred writings called the Diatesseran, and that they were so regarded by the early churches—not one chapter of which has found its way into the New Testament. These gospelmongers were as numerous as insects on the banks of the Nile.

It was preëminently an age of gospel-writers. But scarcely any of these early writings found their way into the New Testament. No doubt the Christian has the fullest assurance that out of this tornado of sacred writings the ones inspired by God were selected without any chance of mistake.

Perhaps there is no early writer who has a greater influence over the minds of Christians than Eusebius. He was so zealous that he believed lying and deceit to be justifiable when done in the interest of the church. No man in an early day did more than he to make all the writings of his period conform to the Christian religion.

He was an unblushing, Janus-faced religious literary thief. He added to, altered, and erased, and what he could not change to suit his turn he destroyed like a true Christian pirate.

He it was who put into the writings of Josephus the article referring to Jesus Christ which the ministers are so fond of quoting. In another instance, where Josephus speaks of an owl, Eusebius makes it read "angel." If he had known how little difference there is between the two he would not hav felt the necessity of lying about it. Scaliger says: "No one has contributed more to Christian history, and no one was guilty of more mistakes."

Waite says: "He is not only guilty of the most unblushing falsehoods, but of forgeries of the vilest character."

And yet the Christian's faith and belief depends in a great degree upon this unscrupulous, deceitful, forging, lying Christian scoundrel.

Faustus, in the middle of the fourth century, said: "The scriptures of the New Testament were not written by the son nor by the apostles, but a long time after by some unknown men, who gave their books the names of the apostles, declaring their contents to be according to these originals;" and farther, that "these gospels are so full of errors and discrepancies, both in fact and opinion, that they can be harmonized neither with themselvs nor one another."

In referring to the abominations of the Old Testament, he said to Augustin: "These, and such as these, are the examples and precepts of the Old Testament. If they are good, why do you not practice them; if they are bad, why do you not condemn the Old Testament in which they are written? But if you think these are spurious interpolations, that is precisely what I think of the New Testament."

Is not this virtually taking away the very ground floor of the New Testament as an inspired volume?

Who is most likely to know and tell the truth about these matters—Faustus, who lived in the fourth century, and was in a great degree cognizant of the facts, or a lot of ecclesiastics whose living depends on keeping the people hoodwinked, and who are removed from the time of Faustus by so many centuries?

Faustus further says: "We hav proved again and again that these writings are a compilation of rumors and beliefs made long after the apostles' departure, and published under the names of the apostles to giv the appearance of authority."

I would like to ask any Christian if he ever saw an autograph manuscript of one of the gospels. I defy him to show that there ever existed a record of such manuscripts. From the beginning no writer has claimed that he ever saw a manuscript of either of the gospels in the handwriting of Luke, Mark, Matthew, or John.

For centuries the church has been exhibiting holy relics. Drops of blood, and nails, and hair of the saints; thorns from the cross of Christ, drops of virgin's milk, pieces of the true cross, and spears and parts of spears which pierced the side of Christ, hav been shown over and over again to the credulous as evidence of the truth of the Christian scheme. But a manuscript of the gospels in the handwriting of Luke, Mark, Matthew, or John would be worth more to the church than all of them.

If such manuscripts ever existed, where are they now? Would not the church hav treasured them with sacred care if they ever had an existence? If they hav been destroyed, should not the church be able to tell when, where, and how? There is not the least evidence that such documents ever were in existence. Assuming that they did exist, who first copied them? and what evidence hav we that they were correctly transcribed? "Bottom facts" often let the bottom out of many fabrications.

The first arithmetic which Professor Robinson published was published in the name of another man. The reputed author of the arithmetic was a mathematician of considerable note, while Professor Robinson, at the time, was comparativly unknown. It will be seen at once that the name well known in mathematical circles would more readily bring the arithmetic to public notice and consideration than the name of a man who was unknown. And so these gospels were written—nobody knows where, nobody knows by whom—under the names of the apostles to giv them force and authority.

The Church and State Education.

There are some good things that seem just a little too good for many of those who profess to prize them most highly. One of these, we regret to say, is religious liberty. If there is any one thing that the people of this country, taken in the mass, are bent on preserving and enjoying, it is this; and yet it is this very thing that some excellent people, who are far from regarding themselvs as abettors of spiritual tyranny, are continually seeking to undermine. Our excellent contemporary, the Journal of Education, of Boston and Chicago, has lately called attention to the action of the Presbyterian Synod of the state of New York, in referring to a committee, to be reported on at the next annual meeting, a resolution affirming that, while a union of church and state in this country is not be thought of, it would still be desirable to incorporate into "the course of state and national education" certain very specific theological doctrins, in which, as it was stated, all Christian sects agreed. They were: The existence of a personal God, the responsibility of man to God, the immortality of the soul, and a future state of rewards and punishments. We cannot suppose for one moment that those who favored this resolution would wish such doctrins as these to become topics of discussion in the public schools, or to be treated as in any way open to doubt or as subject to possible future rectification. If taught at all, they would hav to be taught on authority, just as the catechism might be taught in church schools. This being the case, we cannot understand how the members of the synod who favored the resolution could help seeing how vain was their disclaimer of any desire to establish a connection between church and state. The whole essence of an ecclesiastical establishment consists in the assumption by the state of the right to guide individual citizens in the formation of theological opinions. It matters not how many or how few those opinions may be, how much or how little of theological subtilty their formulation may involve; whenever and wherever the state looks upon the individual as unfit to guide himself in such matters, and therefore undertakes to teach him dogmatically what he ought to believe, then and there we hav the elements of ecclesiastical government.

Now, the instinct of the American people has hitherto been that theology and religion do better without the patronage of the state than with it, and that it is not safe to intrust the civil power, whether federal or local, with the making of any law looking either to the establishment of a church or to the encouragement of any special form of religious belief. We choose our own rulers and we set them over us, not in spiritual matters, but in temporal only, and, if we are wise, we shall restrict their action even in the temporal sphere as much as possible This by the way: What is perfectly clear is that our people do not want to receive direction in theological questions at the hands of the state, and therefore are not prepared to hav theology—even its most widely accepted propositions—introduced into public-school teaching. It is felt that the state has no business to make opinion in these matters, which it undoubtedly would do if it were allowed to impart any theological instruction whatever. Let, for example, the propositions above mentioned become a part of public-school teaching throughout the length and breadth of the land, and the modification of opinion to which this would lead would tend to prepare the way for the introduction of more specific theological teaching, and, little by little, we should hav, by the help of the state, a kind of official theology formed, the influence of which on the development of thought, and perhaps also of morals, would be far from favorable. No better way of stereotyping a civilization could be devised than for a government, through the public-schools, to undertake to tell people what they should believe on the most fundamental questions of theology and philosophy.

We should therefore strongly advise all well-meaning people to pause before they giv their support to measures which certainly would not hav the beneficial results which we may be sure they hav at heart. In what we hav said above we hav assumed the success of the supposed attempt of the state to control the theological opinions of the people. But there is a possibility that things might take a different turn, and that state patronage of certain forms of opinion might tend to produce skepticism in regard to the very doctrins it was sought to protect and strengthen. We hold very strongly, for our own part, that in the public schools, controled as they are by the civil authorities, nothing should be taught beyond the broad and demonstrable results of human inquiry.

There is, lastly, a point to consider which our contemporary above referred to urges with a great deal of force—the question of simple justice. It is known that, whether or not all Christian sects are agreed in accepting the theological propositions set forth, the whole community does not accept them. It may be unfortunate that it should be so—we do not discuss that question—the fact is that it is so; and people who want a merely secular education for their children would hav reason to complain if a teaching they did not think best for their children's minds should be forced upon them. The state, be it remembered, has completely dwarfed and starved out private enterprise in education, so that the average parent has no choice but to send his children to the public school. Should, then, anything be taught there which presupposes a uniformity of opinion that does not exist? If the reason why we hav no state church in this land is that we could not hav one without doing injustice to some element or elements of the population, the same objection precisely will apply to having an authoritativ teaching in the schools of matters that every man claims the right to judge of for himself, and in regard to which important differences of opinion prevail. The case is very simple and clear—too clear to admit of much mystification in the popular mind; and it is to the good sense of the people at large that we trust for the decisiv overthrow of any measures looking to the perversion of our school system, by making it an agency for the propagation of an official theology.—Popular Science Monthly.

"Six Years' Labor and Sorrow."

Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, M.P., has forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER the following account of his so-far successful contest with bigotry in the English House of Commons. The story is printed also in the Pall Mall Gazette:

This struggle has involved five bitterly-contested parliamentary elections and nine actions at law, two of which hav been five times before the Court of Appeal, one of which has been argued before the House of Lords, and another of which is now on appeal to their lordships. In addition, one indictment was expressly promoted to disqualify me from sitting in Parliament, by a prominent Conservativ M.P., at the avowed instigation of a Conservativ society-journal editor. These alone involved very serious pecuniary burdens and enormous waste of time; but my antagonists hav not limited themselvs to fighting me at Northampton and in the law courts. They hav issued against me throughout the country guerrilla-like pamphlets, full of the grossest abuse and misrepresentation, and besides many scores of thousands of such libelous pamphlets, enormous quantities of leaflets hav been officially circulated by the Conservativ and Constitutional Union, containing, within quotation marks, sentences sometimes manufactured by selecting words out of distinct speeches on different subjects, going as far back as twenty-five years, and occasionally with words added as if by me, which I hav never written or spoken.

When the struggle commenced, it is doubtful whether those below the gangway on the Tory side who took the initiatory steps regarded it as more than a good opposition maneuver to giv annoyance to Mr. Gladstone. Personally I believed in 1880, and but for the judgment of the Court of Appeal should still believe, that I had the legal right to make affirmation of allegiance as a member of the House of Commons. Before I came to the table on May 3, 1880, I was strengthened in my belief by the knowledge that Mr. Speaker had taken the opinion of the law officers of the crown, and that they and another eminent legal authority, of the very highest rank, had expressed themselvs in favor of my legal right under the Parliamentary Oaths act, 1866, sec. 4, which gave the right of affirmation in Parliament to "every person of the persuasion of the people called Quakers, and every other person for the time being by law permitted to make a solemn affirmation or declaration instead of taking an oath." The Court of Appeal ultimately held that "every other person" did not include me. In making my claim to affirm, I tried to avoid offense, and "Hansard" shows that I then carefully refrained from saying one word which ought to hav been considered objectionable. Yet I hav been since bitterly assailed for thrusting my irreligious views on the House, and this not only by clergymen and politicians, perhaps unaware of the facts, but also by members actually present in the House on May 3, 1880, who might, at least, if their memories had proved deficient, hav refreshed themselvs by reference to "Hansard." My claim to affirm was referred to a select committee, who refused to allow me to attend before them to state the grounds on which my claim was made, and who, by the casting vote of the Conservativ chairman, decided against my right to affirm. On May 20th the report of the committee was presented, and on the 21st I presented myself to take my seat, ready to take and subscribe the oath of allegiance according to law. Men whose anti-religious opinions had been widely published had already taken the oath of allegiance, not only in previous Parliaments, but actually hav done so in the Parliament which closed its existence in 1885. Tories excuse themselvs for preventing me from taking the oath by saying that I had declared it would not be binding upon me. The reverse is true. The committee examined me on my letter of May 20, 1880. I asked the committee "to remember that in this letter I declare that the oath, if I take it, would bind me, and I now repeat that in the most distinct and formal manner; that the oath of allegiance, namely: 'I do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to her majesty Queen Victoria, her heirs and successors, according to law,' will, when I take it, be most fully, completely, and unreservedly binding upon my honor and conscience; and I crave leave to refer to the unanimous judgment of the full court of the Exchequer Chamber in the case of Miller vs. Salomons, 17th, 'Jurist,' page 463, and to the case of Lancaster and Carlisle Railway Company vs. Heaton, 4th 'Jurist,' new series, page 708, for the distinguishment between the words of asseveration and the essential words of an oath. But I also desire to add, and I do this most solemnly and unreservedly, that the taking and subscribing, or repeating of those words of asseveration, will in no degree weaken the binding effect of the oath on my conscience." On June 22d the house asserted that I should neither affirm nor swear, and on June 23d committed me to the Clock Tower for attempting to take my seat, but released me on the following day with the full knowledge that I intended to repeat the attempt day by day. To terminate this state of things, Mr. Gladstone, on July 2d, carried a resolution under which I took my seat on affirmation, and sat, spoke, and voted for not quite six months of parliamentary sittings. Sir Eardley Wilmot, having failed in a resolution, of which he gave notice, that it is repugnant to the Constitution for an Atheist to sit in the House of Commons, introduced a bill to disqualify Atheists from sitting and voting. This bill he abandoned. Mr. Labouchere introduced a bill giving members the option of affirming their allegiance, but his bill was blocked by several gentlemen, most of whom hav failed to obtain seats in the present Parliament.

The Court of Appeal having decided that I was not included among the "every other person" permitted to affirm, I was reëlected, and on the 27th of April, 1881, when the House was in great difficulty, I withdrew on Sir Stafford Northcote's public suggestion that an Affirmation Bill, if introduced by the government, should hav fair consideration from his Conservativ following. Having induced me to withdraw, the Conservativs opposed and prevented even the formal introduction of the bill, and passed an order under which actual and violent physical force was, on August 3, 1881, used against me. Failing to get any solution and Mr. Newdegate's common informer having signed judgment against me for penalties, I, against the order of the House, in 1882, on the House having by vote declared me to be the sitting member, took the oath and my seat. For this the House, refusing first to hear me in my own defense, expelled me, and Northampton again reëlected me. Once more the House excluded me from entering its precincts, although I had taken no step under this my third return. In 1883 an Affirmation bill was introduced by the Liberal government, and I patiently waited the result, but I was not left idle. I was forced to defend myself against Mr. Newdegate's declaration in the House, and the repeated boast of Conservativ editors, that he would compel me to pay the penalties and costs, or at least would make me bankrupt, and so end the contest by vacating my seat. I had at the same time to meet Sir H. Tyler's blasphemy prosecution, and to read his motion made in the House, where my mouth was gagged, that Mr. Bradlaugh's daughters were unfit persons to be allowed to teach science in the Hall of Science classes. When the Affirmation bill was rejected I made my fourth speech at the bar, and was again excluded by order of the House. I had in the law courts endeavored unavailingly to procure a legal decision as to my status. A friendly action by a prominent Northampton voter was refused a hearing. My suits against the officers of the House were defeated on the ground that no court of law can interfere between the House and one of its members. The crown took no legal action to test the validity of what I had done in February, 1882, and I was nearly paralyzed by the repeated exclusion orders of the House. So in 1884 I again administered the oath, took my seat, and voted, and then voluntarily went for reëlection, so as to preserve my legal status as member, in the event of the legal decision being unfavorable. Unfortunately, the law officers of the crown, with the aid of the present lord chancellor, were not content to try the broad legal question; and the points whether the speaker was sitting or standing, and whether, if he sat, he intended me to be sworn, were gravely left to the jury as complications in the appeal case which now stands for decision in the House of Lords; but this decision, even if it be hostil to me, will only determin that I did not lawfully take the oath of allegiance on February 11, 1884.

Now at last, as I am in my seat, surely the wisest course is, on the one hand, to pass an Affirmation bill, giving to all the option now enjoyed by Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists; and, on the other, to pass such a standing order as shall prevent it being possible in the future for brute force to stand between any lawfully elected member—ready in all things to obey the law—and the seat to which his constituents hav returned him.

Reynolds Arrested for Blasphemy.

When C. B. Reynolds pulled up the stakes of his tent and left Cayuga county, N. Y., to fulfil an engagement in New Jersey, he wrote, "I go to Boonton, N. J., cheered and encouraged by the good success at Montezuma." He will hardly say the same when he takes the remains of his canvas tabernacle out of Boonton. The tent has been wrecked by Catholic and Methodist roughs, the lecturer mobbed and arrested on a charge of blasphemy.

Owing to a week's delay on the part of the railroad, the tent was not pitched in Boonton until Monday, July 26th. When the lecturer stepped upon the platform that evening he faced a fair-sized audience. The Booth family, five ladies and two gentlemen, sang an introductory song, and Mr. Reynolds delivered his lecture. He also distributed some seventy-five copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, giving the latter only to those who asked for them. There was little more that evening than premonitions of coming trouble, in the form of stones thrown upon the roof of the tent, and one rope broken.

Tuesday night the tent was full, and outside was a howling mob of some two hundred and fifty roughs, led and urged on by a pillar of the church holding the position of section boss on the railroad at Boonton. Another ringleader was one William Brown, a coal merchant. Mr. Reynolds, accompanying the ladies of the Booth family, made his way, with some difficulty, through the crowd, and mounted the platform. The mob howled, and threw stones at the tent. It speaks well for the courage of the young ladies of the choir that, in the face of this demonstration, they arose and calmly sang the songs which had been selected for the occasion. The lecturer then attempted to address the audience, but could scarcely make himself heard.

As the crowd grew more rabid and noisy, the lecture was shortened, and the exercises closed with a song. The continuance of the meetings was announced from the platform. Then the tent was cleared of the rabble. Upon examination, it was found that two of the smaller guy ropes holding the center pole in position had been cut. Had the main guy been severed the pole would hav fallen, and loss of life must hav resulted. The lecturer did picket duty until midnight, dodging an occasional stone that came through the air from the hand of some friend of Christianity.

Wednesday morning the air was full of threats against the Secular lecturer. Mr. Reynolds, knowing the names of the leaders of the mob of the previous evening, went before a justice and entered complaint against them. The justice was apparently somewhat bewildered by this move. He so far forgot his plain duty that, instead of issuing warrants for the arrest of the parties, he handed the complaint to a marshal, with instructions to show it to the persons therein named. Mr. Reynolds, however, knew more law than that, and after depositing $5 with the justice succeeded in compassing the arrests of James Neafie, a railroad laborer and semi-Methodist; Josephus Dixon, merchant and Reformed churchman; William Brown, dealer in coal and Reformed church piety; H. G. Randall, a bridge-tender and follower of Wesley, and George Hyler, a coachman and Methodist.

Mr. Reynolds next notified the mayor that he had reason to believe an attack on the tent was contemplated, and asked for protection. The mayor being ill, the petitioner had to be contented with seeing a daughter-in-law, who said the mayor had ordered the city marshal's presence at the tent. In the evening he proceeded again to the tent, and while lighting the lamps was arrested by the marshal on a charge of blasphemy. He was taken up-town to the lock-up, followed by a threatening, hooting mob. The arrest had evidently been timed so as to prevent a lecture being given that evening. Mr. Reynolds waived examination, and asked for an adjournment. To show that it understood what an adjournment meant, the court granted the request, but demanded bail in the sum of $300. This was found in the person of Mr. Maxfield, a good Liberal of the town, and Mr. Reynolds, escorted by the same rabble that had followed him to court, returned to the tent. The mob was tumultuous, but the choir sang two songs as though nothing unusual was expected. The lecturer opened his discourse, and continued for about ten minutes an ineffectual attempt to make himself heard. At the end of that time the marshal brought word from the mayor and common council that they could no longer guarantee protection or be responsible for the consequences if the lecture was not brought to a close at once. This was virtually giving the place over into the hands of the mob. The marshal expressed the opinion that there would be bloodshed if the speaker continued. Being of the same opinion himself, Mr. Reynolds, in the interests of peace, acquiesced, and dismissed the audience. But it was one thing to dismiss an audience, and another thing to get the audience to go. Mr. Reynolds, therefore, had to content himself with making his own escape, leaving the tent in possession of the mob. Threats of lynching, tar and feathers, stoning, and drowning were freely made, and but for the individual and collectiv bravery of the Booth family Mr. Reynolds would without doubt hav been maltreated personally and thrown into the Morris & Essex canal which ran close by. This family deserves to be remembered. Charles Booth, the head, is a quiet and determined English Secularist who came to this country nearly forty years ago. His wife, Mrs. A. M. Booth, is one of those splendid women fit to be chief executiv of a nation. The heroins who composed the choir are Miss Kate Booth, Miss Ada Booth, Miss Jessie Booth, and Miss Fannie Booth. The sons are Hubert, Charles, and Thomas, manly young men, who would not be the first to seek a fight nor the first to leave one, when forced into it. With John Krahmer, a young Freethinker of New York, who was helping Mr. Reynolds in the work connected with the tent, they formed a guard that brought Mr. Reynolds out of the affair with whole bones and dry clothes. Before the advance of the Booth family, led by the intrepid mother, the crowd of roughs parted like sheep.

When Mr. Reynolds visited the tent ground on Thursday morning, his beloved tabernacle lay flat upon the ground, an almost total wreck. The main and auxiliary guys had been cut by the Christians, and the tent had fallen upon the benches and chairs, the heavy center-pole breaking several of the latter in its descent. When the fragments were gathered together, Mr. Reynolds estimated that Boonton would hav a bill of several hundred dollars to pay.

On Friday Mr. Reynolds was served with the following order:

"BOONTON, N. J., July 30, 1886.

"MR. C. B. REYNOLDS, Sir: At a special meeting of the Common Council of the town of Boonton, held on Thursday evening, July 28, 1886, the following resolution was adopted:

"'Resolved, That the town clerk be authorized to notify Mr. C. B. Reynolds that he is strictly forbidden to hold any more of his so-called Liberal but unlawful meetings within the corporate limits of the town of Boonton.'

"'In accordance with the above resolution you are hereby notified to discontinue all such meetings within the corporate limits.

"By order of the Common Council of the town of Boonton.

The tent having been demolished, this, of course, was adding insult to injury. Mr. Reynolds sent back word to the council that they had exhibited the most monumental asinin stupidity on record. He then quietly awaited developments.

The examination on the charge of blasphemy took place Saturday, the 31st ult. Following is the complaint. It is a product of the combined literary abilities of the deponent and the justice of the peace. The indictment reads:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, } SS.
MORRIS CO. }

Wm. Brown, of said county, on his oath saith that on the evening of July 27, 1886, he was at a public meeting held in a large tent for that purpose situate on the westerly side of Washington street, Boonton, N. J., and was addressed by one C. B. Reynolds; and said Reynolds publicly blasphemed the holy name of God by denying and contumaciously reproaching the being and existence of God and of the scriptures as contained in the books of the Old and New Testament by speaking of man in "being made of the dust" and saying that used the dust up so he put man to sleep and took a rib out of him and made woman and remarked in a ridiculous manner (who believes such nonsense) and spoke of the Bible saying of birds and fish were made out of water and said the Bible spoke in another chapter of the same animals being made of clay and remarked (who believes such nonsense) trying to prove the scripture false and making fun of and ridiculing the Bible and divers other remarks, therefore the deponent prays that said Reynolds may be arrested and dealt with according to law.

WILLIAM BROWN.

Sworn and subscribed 28th day of July, 1886, before me,
JOHN A. VAN ORDEN, Justice of the Peace.

To enable the reader to reach the gist of this remarkable document without the labor of analyzing it, the charges against Mr. Reynolds may be enumerated as follows:

1. He addressed Brown in a large tent for that purpose.
2. Blasphemed the holy name of God.
3. Denied and "contumaciously reproached" the being and existence of God and the Bible.
4. Spoke of man as being made of dust.
5. Said "that used the dust all up."
6. Put man to sleep.
7. Took a rib out of him and made woman.
8. Remarked in a ridiculous manner.
9. Ridiculed the Bible and divers other remarks.

The examination was held in the ball-room of the United States Hotel, and the room was crowded. At the head of the justice's table sat Mr. Van Orden, locally known as "Old Tootyache," once noted for possessing all qualities but virtue, but now a stanch Methodist; next to him sat Mr. Garrison, the editor of the Boonton weekly Bulletin, a deacon in the Methodist church, upon whose cheek is a perennial color akin to the bloom of peaches. Opposit the justice was the prosecuting attorney, N. S. Kitchel, who is looked down upon by even the indecent portion of the community, so much lower than they has he sunk by his spying and repetition of village gossip. On the other side sat Mr. Reynolds, with a TRUTH SEEKER in his hand, the pictures showing, much to the amusement of some and the anger of others of the audience. By the table, also, sat the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, whom the World of this city described as "a mysterious stranger, who sat beside Mr. Reynolds, and gave him pointers when needed." But no points that Mr. Reynolds could raise, or the editor suggest, were of any avail, nor did any one expect they would be. The justice, terrorized by the prosecuting attorney, had made up his mind to hold the prisoner for the Grand Jury to indict, and the proceedings were a perfect farce. All Mr. Reynolds could do, therefore, was to draw into view the long ears of the justice, and show the ignorance and bitter spirit of the prosecution. The following is the official record of the proceedings, written out by the judge with vast waste of the gray matter of the brain, and profuse expenditure of ink. When he was visited Monday morning for this copy, his good right hand was covered with writing-fluid and his brow with perspiration. He complained of being "overhet." The document is as unique in its way as is the justice the author dispenses in his court. It cost Mr. Reynolds one dollar:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY } On Complaint of WM. BROWNE
vs. } for Blasphemy.
CHAS. B. REYNOLDS. }

Evidence of Wm. Brown.
Question by N. S. Kitchel, Esq.:
Did you attend a meeting held in a tent on the northerly side of Washington street in Boonton?
Ans. by Wm. Brown:
I Did.
Ques. by Mr. Kitchel:
Did you see this man Reynolds there?
Ans.: I did.
Ques.:
Tell us what he said
Ans. by Brown:

Well he said that in a certain part of the Bible it said God made Everything the Birds the Beasts the Fishes & everything out of water and in another place it says that God made Adam out of dust and he wanted to make a mate for Adam but the Old Man had used up all the Dust in making Adam so he did not know just what to do so he put Adam to sleep I don't know whether it was with Ether or Chloroform and took a rib out of Adam to make a Woman, now you all know if you took every Bone in a Man's Body it would not make the Jaw of a Woman. Who believes any such nonsense. In that way he tried to ridicule the Bible & God and said he took a piece of a verse here & there.

Mr. Reynolds asked him if he knew of any verse that he took a part of?

Ans: No.

Cross-examined.

Ques. by Mr. Reynolds:

Do you know that it was the Bible I was reading from?

Ans.:

I do not.

Ques.:

Are you familiar with the Bible I guess not?

Brown did not answer.

Evidence of George Hessey.

Question by Mr. Kitchel:

Hav you ever seen this man Reynolds or talked. Hav you heard or had a conversation with him.

Question objected. Objection overruled.

Ans. by Hessey:

I hav.

Mr. Kitchel:

Tell the Court what you know about him—Reynolds.

Ans. by Hessey:

I met Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Cramer. Mr. Reynolds asked me about what I thought of his Lectures I answered him that I had a complete set of Ingersoll's works at home but I am satisfied that there is no truth in them nor in your Lectures.

(Objected to. Objection overruled.)

I believe the Bible is true, and your Lectures are nothing in them but ridicule Mr. Reynold's answer was that is our argument to ridicule and make fun.

The complainant then rested.

The defendant C. B. Reynolds then moved to dismiss the Complaint because it did not charge him the Defendant with Blasphemy, & said the words who believes such nonsense sworn to in the Complaint was stated there as the words of Brown the complainant and said if those words were Blasphemous Brown was the blasphemer. I refused to Dismiss the complaint as the words attributed to Brown by the Defendant were the words of the Defendant as I understood the complaint & as clearly appeared by the Testimony of Brown.

The Defendant then offered as evidence John Cramer.

Counsel for complainant objected to his being sworn because he was not competent he then Examined him on his Voire dire.

Question by Mr. Kitchel: Do you believe there is a God?

Answer: Yes.

Question: Do you believe the Bible is true?

Answer: No.

Question: What punishment will be administered to you if you swear Falsely?

Answer: I will be punished by the Laws of the state for perjury.

Question by Mr. Kitchel:

Do you believe any punishment will be inflicted upon you by almighty God if you swear Falsely?

Answer: I dont know.

Mr. Kitchel then read from Nixon's digest as follows unless the Witness believes there is a God who will punish him if he swears falsely he cannot be admitted as a witness.

I then asked the witness several questions concerning his respecting the Character & Attributes of God he said he was an Agnostic & had no views on the subjects.

I then thought it to be clearly my duty to exclude him as a witness. J. A. VAN ORDEN, J. P.

We hav preserved the construction of this document for the benefit of coming generations. It is, however, incomplete. Mr. Van Orden made it out for his side, not for the other, and the TRUTH SEEKER editor was compelled to labor with him for an hour or more to get him to insert anything that Mr. Reynolds said, or objected to the other side saying. His frequent threats to lock Mr. Reynolds up if he did not keep still; his own ignorant blundering, made worse by his furious anger; the silly questioning, by himself and the prosecuting attorney, of Mr. Krahmer; the frequent laughter of the audience at the pitfalls Mr. Reynolds led him into; his arbitrary ruling out of a competent witness, and the admission of the irrelevant rehearsal of an imaginary private conversation by a coal-heaver—all these are left out, that the glory of New Jersey justice may more abound.

The first witness, Wm. Brown, is a "heeler" for the Young Men's Christian Association and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. He admitted, on cross-examination, that he was not familiar with the Bible, and acknowledged that he could not specify what verses Mr. Reynolds took "pieces" of to ridicule the creation account. Hessey, the second witness, was not at the tent, and his sworn version of a conversation was, as Mr. Reynolds told him in court, manifest perjury. But it was when Mr. Reynolds called Mr. Krahmer to giv the true version of the language used that the inquisitorial spirit of the prosecution and the long ears of the judge showed most plainly. The New Jersey statute reads that a person who does not believe in a supreme being is not a competent witness. Nixon's Digest has it that a belief in future rewards and punishments is necessary to a witness's competency. The first question asked Mr. Krahmer was:

Q. Do you believe in a God? A. Yes.

Q. Do you believe in the Bible? A. No.

Mr. Reynolds claimed that, according to the laws of the state, the witness was entitled to take the oath, and, in any event, to affirm. Some of the ridiculous questions put to Mr. Krahmer were:

BY THE COURT: Wouldn't an oath be as binding upon you if taken upon an almanac as upon the Bible?

To this Mr. Krahmer returned no answer.

BY THE PROSECUTION: What effect would it hav upon God if you told a lie? A. I don't know.

Q. What effect would it hav upon you with God if you told a lie? A. I don't know.

The attorney then got sufficient control of his temper and tongue to put his question in this way:

Q. What effect would it hav upon you if you tell a lie? A. I should be amenable to the law punishing perjury.

Then the justice broke in:

Q. What would God do to you if you tell a lie? A. To the justice: What would he do to you? Reply by the justice: I don't know. Answer by Mr. Krahmer to the first question: Neither do I.

BY THE COURT: Don't you know what you believe about future rewards and punishments? A. No.

BY THE COURT: Then you are not a competent witness.

BY THE PROSECUTION: The laws of New Jersey say you must believe something. New Jersey rules out Infidels, Freethinkers, and TRUTH SEEKERS.

Ex-Mayor Worman said that he could bring two good Christians who would refute the prosecution's witnesses, but upon calling their names they were found to hav absented themselvs. Mr. Reynolds then concluded he had seen enough of Jersey justice, and, after again asking for the dismissal of the case, and getting the usual refusal, let the matter go, remarking that he thought that in Morristown he could find a court and lawyers who knew something.

Mr. Van Orden bowed his head as though in prayer, and pronounced judgment to the effect that Mr. Reynolds must giv bail in the sum of $400 to await the action of the grand jury of Morris county, which would assemble at Morristown on the second Tuesday of October. A bail bond was prepared, after much laborious work and many erasures, by the judge, and signed by Mr. Reynolds and Councilman James Maxfield. Mr. Maxfield is one of the oldest and most respected residents of the town. His house, in the anti-slavery times, was one of the stations of the "underground railway" which transported slaves to Canada, and he left the church because of its pro-slavery attitude. A few years ago, when the large iron mills of the place shut down, and hundreds of the workmen were left destitute and starving, Mr. Maxfield and Mr. Worman distributed food among them, visiting them in the evening, that the laborers might not seem to be objects of public charity. Mr. Maxfield further honors himself by becoming responsible for the appearance at the inquisition of, let us hope, the last man arrested for blasphemy in his state.

After the court was dismissed Mr. Reynolds had nothing to do but wait for the judge to write out his report, get affidavits as to the conduct of the men he had had arrested, and as to the damage to his tent. The top of the tent is ruined, and Mr. Reynolds will be unable to pitch it again for some time. The feeling of the town against the Infidels was shown by the hootings elicited from the rabble whenever Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Krahmer, and the "mysterious stranger" showed themselvs, unaccompanied by friends. Wherever they walked with members of the Booth or Worman family they were only stared at as possible curiosities from sheol. The marshal of Boonton is a Catholic named Gilmartin, and the priest of the parish told his father that if the marshal arrested any of the Catholics concerned in the attack upon the tent he, the priest, would turn the marshal out of church. Afterward the priest publicly deprecated the destruction of the tent, but principally, we fear, upon the ground that the town would hav to pay the damages.

The case now goes to Morristown, the county seat. The result, of course, is in doubt. Should the bench be occupied by a gentleman and the jury-box filled with civilized citizens, Mr. Reynolds will triumph. Should these conditions be reversed, he will not. Public opinion in Boonton is tremendously excited, and the prosecution will push the case both to be avenged upon the Infidel and to protect the men arrested for rioting. In the mean time, Mr. Reynolds's occupation is gone till the tent can be repaired, and the owner will devote his time to filling such engagements to lecture as he can obtain, and in attending to the preliminary arrangements for the meeting of the New York State Freethinkers' Convention, which will be called at White Sulphur Springs early next month.

Illustrations.

The Sabbatarian Scarecrow is an institution that is erected upon Sunday at the doors of nearly all places of amusement, except the churches. The people don't pay much attention to him, as a general thing, but he is still on guard in front of our theaters and museums of art and natural history. He ought to be buried, and the rules and regulations governing resurrection should, in his case, be suspended.

Adam and Eve are getting on dangerous ground, as will be seen. And here we may call attention to the fact that Adam Clarke, the Bible commentator, believed that the "serpent" who tempted Eve should hav been translated "monkey." Others differ with him, and hold that "minister of the gospel" would be a more correct rendering. Mr. Heston has given us both the serpent and the monkey, with the liberty to choose between them. Judging the past by the present, the minister-of-the-gospel theory is not a bad one to fall back on, in default of an agreement upon either of the others.

Editorial Notes.

"IF Col. Robert G. Ingersoll lectures next winter, Shakspere will be his theme." This item is from the New York Times. We are not prepared to say whether it is true or not.

THE Christian at Work says: "Seventy-five cents is the exact value of a nowadays silver dollar." This statement is deceptiv. The value of a dollar is the amount of some product of the earth that you can buy with it; and cannot as much be bought for a silver dollar as for any other? We would be pleased to purchase all the "nowadays silver dollars" the Christian at Work possesses at seventy-five cents apiece; and, of course, a religious paper would not take any more for an article than it really believes it to be worth.

FREETHINKERS must be careful of their words. The editor of the Independent is on the alert. Last week he quoted this from Si Slokum's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER on Sam Jones:

"I wish I had the 'gift of gab,' I would get on to the 'revival' racket at once. There are thousands, if not millions, in it."

This sentiment, the Independent suggests, leaves little room for suprise that "scandalously bad people occasionally get into the church." Si Slokum spoke in jest; but the thousands and millions in it accounts for the enthusiasm of a good many religious teachers who would strongly resent the imputation that they are "scandalously bad."

A CORRESPONDENT of THE TRUTH SEEKER who has just returned to New York from a European tour which included England, Ireland, and Scotland, reports that American sympathy and financial aid for the cause of Home Rule in Ireland hav been unfortunate rather than otherwise. They hav given the opponents of the measure a chance to raise the cry of "foreign intervention," and "foreign gold," and to appeal to English patriotism, "harmony," and "union." The comparativ insignificance of the sums forwarded has raised many a laugh, too, at the expense of "open-handed Americans." In the aggregate a large sum has been raised in this country, but a few wealthy Englishmen could place double the amount against it without feeling the loss. What the Irish people need more than financial aid is that unity, patriotism, and mutual confidence which made Home Rule possible in America. Above all, they need to get rid of the pope and the church.

THE results of the investigations of the committee into the mysteries of spirit photography are given in THE TRUTH SEEKER this week. The report is decidedly adverse to the claims made by Mr. Robinson and the medium. It has not been demonstrated to the satisfaction of the committee that the forms seen in dim outline on the photographs obtained are those of spirits. On the other hand, although the committee was composed of professional photographers and adepts in the art, the process of producing these forms has not been discovered. The one man who can throw light on that subject is Mr. Keeler, and he, of course, insists that they are bona fide photographs of departed spirits returned to earth. Therefore the question remains unsettled. Nevertheless the report is entertaining reading to those interested in spirit photography. It is proper to say that one member of the committee, Mr. Partridge, was so engaged during the week of the sessions that he was unable to attend. He has not seen the report, and his signature is therefore omitted.

BUTTE CITY, M. T., July 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Putnam's lecture, "The Glory of Infidelity," at Renshaw's Hall last night, was largely attended by Freethinkers, and also by good Christians. Mr. Putnam is a speaker of wonderful magnetic power.

CHARLES STOFFEL.

TAPPAN, O., July 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Our literary society recently passed an amendment to their constitution to the effect that nothing should be said disrespectful of the Bible or the Christian religion. At the next meeting I gave them an oration to inform them that I was not built that way. They interrupted me once, but I told them if they did it again I would prosecute them, and, in conclusion, I told them, if they had any further business with me, to call up at my office. They hav not put in appearance yet. One class-leader said I had made five Infidels in his class. Amen. The fine was 50 cents.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith I hand you $5 to be applied on our subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. We are a little behind time, but trust that the remittance will be acceptable.

Mrs. Hawkins and myself are greatly pleased with the illustrations, and hope they will be continued. Those delicately organized persons who are shocked with plain truths plainly stated are certainly to be pitied. We take great delight in opening the eyes of our Christian friends by showing them illustrated numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and find that it has a tendency to set them thinking. Keep up the illustrations; they are a good feature, aud should aid materially in increasing the circulation of your brave paper.

BUTTE, M. T., July 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Last evening, the 13th inst., I called a few of the Liberals together and met them at Renshaw Hall, at 8:30 P.M.

The meeting was called to order by O. B. Whitford, who was elected president; Charles Stoffie, vice-president; E. N. Dunekel, secretary; H. Legraves, corresponding secretary. Platform and bylaws were adopted for the government of the society, which was voted to be known and called the Butte Secular Society.

Inclosed find petition for charter, $5 for the same, and $10 for missionary pamphlets—small ones, that people will take time to read.

We expect Putnam here on the 16th to giv us a couple of lectures. Respectfully, O. B. WHITFORD.

CANTON, ILL., July 22, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $7.50 for pamphlets.

Mayor Armstrong, of Canton, gave notice some time ago that he would enforce the ordinance in regard to Sabbath-breaking. Now, as a good general is prepared to repulse every assault made on his lines, so ought we to be prepared to turn all such bigoted acts to our own advantage. We can do this by one or all of three ways. First, by denouncing it publicly; second, by procuring a Liberal lecturer, and third, by constituting ourselvs agents, and procuring a lot of pamphlets discussing the subject of the laws they are trying to enforce. We will guarantee such efforts will be attended with success, because at such times people become aroused, and act on their manhood, and will gladly accept anything that will help them to discuss the justice or injustice of the act. Mr. E. A. Stevens has the right idea—when they attack him, to light into them and giv them Hail Columbia.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

GREAT BEND, PA., July 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: For many years I hav been what the world terms an Infidel, and since last September I hav been a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am pleased with the pictures. I don't know as they make a good Infidel any better, but I think they reach farther among God's people, and do more to set Christians thinking than anything you can induce them to read or listen to. If Christians will think, they will doubt, and doubting means skepticism.

Our village has a population of two thousand, representing, perhaps, one-half of the nations of the earth, and I do not think there are a half-dozen of that number, outside of Christian dupes, that dare speak their opinion. Business men would be boycotted, and laboring men thrown out of employment. The Catholics of Great Bend hav a large majority of the church young people. The "forty hours' devotion" has just ended, and the Catholic mud-clogs hav ceased their thunderings upon our sidewalks during all hours of the night, and we are beginning to get our usual rest and sleep again. We are thankful that "forty hours' devotion" comes but once a year.

The Methodist society hav their third church. The first one was not large enough, and they had it torn down and built greater. This left them in debt, and in a few years it burnt down covered by a good insurance. They then erected another, still greater, with a steeple much too high to look well. The members dedicated their new church to God, got out of debt, became proud and arrogant, displeased their God, and about six o'clock last night, in a fit of anger, he (God) stretched out his mighty hand and smote their church with lightning. Commencing at the top of the steeple, and branching in several directions, it shattered the temple from steeple to basement. The news spread, and in a short time hundreds gathered about the place, some wondering at the mighty power that had shown his hand to warn Christians of their neglect of duty, non-attendance at church, etc.; others to criticise the condition of the lightning-rod that had been placed upon God's temple to protect it from his own mighty wrath. A few poor Infidels had their opinions (unexpressed); they dare not word them in this priest-ridden, hidebound place, for fear of a Christian boycott.

Now, we want some Liberal lectures here to open the eyes of the blind, and giv strength to the weak and downtrodden. What is necessary to be done to get a lecturer here? We are on the line of the Erie Railroad, and the Delaware, Lackawana & Western Railroad. There are quite large towns on either side of us, such as Susquehanna, Binghamton, Owego, etc. I do not see why it is not a good field for Freethought lectures. We hav never had anything of the kind here. It would be a surprise.

A. B. CONKLIN.

GLADSTONE, QUEENSLAND, AUS., June 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Your inestimable paper reached me on May 20th, and I can assure you it is the best champion of our cause I hav seen. I am a subscriber to several Freethought papers, but THE TRUTH SEEKER stands foremost in the ranks of Freethought. The illustrations are capital, in my humble opinion, and should almost be enough to convince anyone of the ridiculous superstition of Christianity. I hav endeavored to get some subscribers about here, but I hav had no luck so far, only I hav persuaded some to read them, which may do some good in the future. I intend to advertise it in the local paper, if I can persuade the editor to insert it. At any rate, I shall do my best to get it better known than it now is. Should you think this fit to survive the waste-paper basket, please insert it among your "Letters from Friends." You will find inclosed $4.04 for my subscription till January, 1887, and I trust before the next is due some of my friends about here will follow my example, and take it for themselvs.

W. L. G. RILEY.

BOWLING GREEN, O., July 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav the pleasure to renew my subscription, and send the name of another young man as a subscriber. I am highly pleased with the cartoons of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for one can say, like all other school-teachers, that pictures are an effectual way of teaching lessons that will never be forgotten, because what the eye sees the mind receives. I would ask some of my friends who object to the cartoons, "Who gave the Bible publishers authority to cartoon the Bible?" They were not there in the time these events occurred, and it is only by hearsay evidence that we hav them.

This is an orthodox neighborhood, in which superstition has full sway, with the exception of a dozen or so of Liberals, but we are gaining ground, and are not moral cowards. What we are trying to get before the people is the worth of morals, and the fact that religion and morality are not synonymous terms. The former teaches us our duty to an imaginary God, and the latter relates to our social bearing now and here.

The most effectual way of getting Freethought before the people is to agitate; that is, to drop a word here and a word there, and some of the seed will spring up and yield a hundredfold.

ALVA KOONS.

BELGRADE, MINN., July 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: A Freethinker, a true Freethinker, be it a man or woman, married or single, is the only free and really sovereign human being, a lord—not a "lawd," among his fellow-beings. To be a Freethinker is the most glorious, most elevated, spiritual position in life man can obtain. It givs him satisfaction in every respect, when he is in health, and when he is sick, or even on his death-bed. A Freethinker cannot fear death itself, for that itself can hav no terror, but he may be afraid of the pain and agony which pervade so many a death. The future promised eternal bliss or threatened damnation can hav no meaning whatever to him. It takes a good deal of study, energy, and a good, fearless judgment to free himself from all the superstition of the creeds which we hav almost naturally inherited, for they are not only taught but drilled into a man. After he has freed himself from all these fetters, he may well stand up and be proud of it, and say, "I am a free man (or, as the case may be, a free woman), a living being, trying to be as happy as possible, and to make others as happy as possible." A true Freethinker is proud of it, and he always confesses his Freethought everywhere and to everybody, because he knows that it is, with good health, the best thing a man can hav and enjoy. Knowing this, he will communicate his ideas and views to his fellow-beings, to make them enjoy mental freedom also. We all ought to be rejoicing and jubilant that we liv in a country and in a century where we hav and get the means to make us free.

Well, we Freethinkers hold that mental liberty, with good physical health, is the greatest boon. Mental liberty is, unlike money, not growing less within you by giving it to others; you may giv away all of it to thousands and thousands of your fellow-beings and hav still all left for your own use. You giv away the greatest human blessing, i. e., Freethought, and still will not lose a particle of it. Why not giv it away and communicate it to others freely? A man going home to his family sees some luscious fruit or something else that is good; he will, if he can, get it. For whom? Well, for himself, and, above all, for those he loves at home. So the Freethinker will not stop until those he loves, and those first, are freed from the fetters of superstition, because he knows that Freethought is something good. A Freethinker whose wife and children attend church and Sunday-school regularly is a humbug, a failure—in fact, no Freethinker at all. It is that class who recant on their death-bed, to the greatest joy and satisfaction of the priest and reverend. A true Freethinker cannot, and if he would a thousand times, recant. Under no circumstances, as long as his mental faculties are not impaired, would he pronounce a thing black of which he is convinced that it is white. Charity begins at home. Dear TRUTH SEEKER, did you not suspect something when a subscriber wrote you the cartoons were wrong because they hurt the feelings of Christian friends? Hav you had no suspicion at all that these Christian friends with their fine and delicate feelings liv with the said subscriber who finds fault or has been dictated to find fault with the cartoons? I bet you five dollars these "Christian friends" are the dear wife and children and mother-in-law. Not hurt the delicate feelings of our Christian brethren and sisters who boycott us without fail and for lifetime, as soon as they know we are Infidels, and call us immoral! Recant and join a church or be boycotted in this and damned in the other world! We do not care much about that threatened damnation in the other world, and the time is not far when a religious boycott in this country will be as ineffectual as in Protestant Germany. Well, if the nerves of our Christian friends are strong enough to execute a boycott on a neighbor or wish him eternal damnation, then their "delicate feelings" will not be damaged much by looking at a decent and true picture or cartoon.

VERITAS.

SOUTH ACWORTH, N. H., July 25, E.M. 286.

MR. EDITOR: In reading "News and Notes," by S. P. Putnam, in the last two or three TRUTH SEEKERS, I hav become convinced that he ought to revise and enlarge them until they will make a book of about the size of "A Truth Seeker in Europe." I think nearly everyone that has D. M. Bennett's "Around the World" would buy one, as we hav at present no Freethought history of the United States, except a little in the last volume of the "Around the World" books.

I would also suggest that Bell, Jamieson, Kelso, Remsburg, Reynolds, Walker, Watts, York, and all others who are traveling through the country write a history of the sections they visit. If each one cannot make up a book, each could write one or two chapters, and all together make a good book; aud I feel very sure that it would have a large sale. Let's hear from the rest of the TRUTH SEEKER family.

Your cartoons are very good, and I believe that most of your readers are pleased with them. I think the three or four last ones are fully as good as any.

J. A. ALLAN.

HAVANA, ILL., July 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find 25 cents for TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC. I read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I am well pleased with it. Just as soon as I read it through I hand it to some of my friends, and let them read it, and I find that they are well pleased with it.

I am a Freethinker, and your paper just suits me. The people here call me an Infidel, but I would rather be styled an Infidel than a church-member. I am going to do all that I can for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I went to Sunday-school the other Sunday, and the superintendent was teaching the class I was in, and he said every person had a conscience that told him to do right. He asked me what I thought about it, and I told him I did not believe it. I told him that all persons had a faculty in their mind that told them to do that which they think is right, but before they know what is right and wrong they hav to be taught it, and because I said this, he told me if I came there to dispute with him I had better stay away; so you can see what cranks we hav here in our Sunday-schools. I think, if I could get him to read my paper, he would learn to be reasonable. Yours very truly, J. A. WEAVER.

RIVERSIDE, CAL., July 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: If you will be kind enough to inform me through your paper at what period of the world's history numerals were known to hav been used, you will confer a great favor. How could, for instance, antediluvians number, etc.? Do you publish any book giving light on the subject?

C. NEWTON ROSS.

[This a question upon which the encyclopedists confess there is hardly any light, although it has been made the subject of laborious investigation. The Arabic numerals now in use were invented by the Brahmans of India, and are of great antiquity, though there is no reason for supposing that the Jews ever used them. The antediluvian method of notation probably consisted of a series of marks, | for one; || for two; ||| for three, etc., up to ten. These, with arbitrary combinations to express larger numbers, were undoubtedly the first numerals. These marks are the basis of the Latin, Greek, Roman, and the Chinese methods. The so-called Arabic numerals, in their original form, hav an inherent significance denoting the number of units they stand for. Notation is evidently nearly as old as written speech, and, like language, has had its growth and evolution. The modern arithmetic was not used until about the middle of the sixteenth century, and for a long time after its introduction was taught only in universities. We do not publish any book upon the subject. —ED. T. S.]

GREELEY, COL., July 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished reading S. R. Shepherd's letter of June 25th to your paper. I do not think all mind-reading is a humbug. I hav had the pleasure several times of attending places where mind-reading was one of the principal features of the occasion. I will relate my experience on one occasion. It was in 1878, in Colorado Springs. A Mr. Taylor and lady advertised a sleight-of-hand performance the first evening, and the next evening they would expose Spiritualism. I was one of several men chosen by the audience as a committee to see fair play. The show progressed finely and satisfactorily until they reached mind-reading. The professor then stated that the mind-reading trick belonged to the lady, and he had no right to expose it, even if he could. We wrote upon slips of paper any question or other matter we saw fit to write. I repaired to a dressing-room just off the stage, and wrote my question. I took my account-book from my pocket and wrote the following question: "Has the property left by my mother any incumbrance upon it or not?" I returned the book to its place in my pocket, folded the paper up, and put it in my vest-pocket. To my surprise, she answered it. She then said if I would hold it in my hand over her head she would read it word for word. I held it over her head, and, to the surprise of the committee, and the audience, numbering about three hundred, she read every word I had written, and, to cap the climax, she even told the figures on the other side of the paper, and I did not know myself that the figures were there at the time I wrote the question. I know she had not seen the paper, for I built the stage and all the rooms in the building and built the building itself, and I know there was no way to get into the room I wrote the question in except the door I went in at, and I shut and locked it when I went in. I am not a Spiritualist, but an Atheistic Materialist, but there are some things I cannot account for, and mind-reading is one of them. J. W. LEIGHTON.

ROME CITY, IND., July 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of this place met for the purpose of securing a series of Liberal lectures at Rome City, which is situated on the Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad, thirty-one miles north of Fort Wayne. The railroad company hav fitted an island for picnics, etc., at this place, which is known as Island Park. There is a large tabernacle, and hotels to accommodate a big crowd. In fact, it is the Chautauqua of Indiana.

The churches hav their Sunday-school congress now in session, which will last about two weeks. We want you to intercede to secure some of the best speakers. I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that Putnam comes East some time in September. Perhaps it can be arranged for him to attend.

Talmage and Sam Jones are booked to speak at Rome next week, and we would like something a little better than their old-time superstitions. ITHAMAR EDDY.

[Liberal speakers are invited to correspond with Mr. Eddy, giving terms, etc.]

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., July 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: If you hav the information, please let me know how many insane people are in the lunatic asylums in the United States, and how many were rendered insane by superstition. Please publish the facts in your paper.

W. P. CROW.

[We hav the statement of President Seelye, of Amherst College, that the proportion of insane persons to the entire population of the United States in 1880 was as 1 to 549. As the population at that time was 50,151,866, the number of insane persons would hav been about 91,350. No later statistics are at hand. We are unable to say what proportion of these were made insane by superstition. In such reports of insane asylums as we hav consulted, three principal causes account for more than half of the cases of insanity. These stand: 1. Secret vice; 2. Alcohol; 3. Religious excitement. The first leads the second and third by a long way as a cause of mental ruin. Just how many persons lose their reason through superstitious excitement will probably never be known. The stock of religious lunatics is quite large, but students of psychology hav pointed out that it is often very difficult to distinguish between "inspiration" and dementia. These cases are therefore given the benefit of the doubt, and are not added to the ranks of the insane. The spread of Freethought, and the early inculcation of ethics founded upon reason and experience, would greatly lessen this species of hallucination. It might hope to even eradicate it entirely, except where there exists a predisposition to insanity from other causes. Weak minds yield easily to the unbalancing influence of religious fanaticism, which fact accounts for the "success" of the Salvation Army, "revivalism," and other religious epidemics—the Perfectionist craze at Cincinnati, for instance.—ED. T. S.]

PROVIDENCE, July 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In a communication to THE TRUTH SEEKER some time in May I related an incident that came under my own observation, how a friend of mine became insane from attending Spiritual seances. Said communication was printed in the issue of June 12th. June 15th I received a postal with an effusion written upon it and signed by a person purporting to be a Spiritualist of thirty years' experience, who "never saw anyone made insane by its divine teaching," calling me a "liar, and a fool or knave, or both." I hav had occasion at times to speak of the pernicious and demoralizing influence of Spiritualism and religion (as I consider both in the same light), and the postal confirms all my previous convictions and statements. I do not mean to say that all Christians are fanatics, or that all Spiritualists are cranks, but the spirit that prompts a person, upon the slightest pretext, to call another "a liar, fool, or knave" in refutation of a fact, lacks only the courage to ply the assassin's knife, or the opportunity to pile and kindle the fagot around the body of everyone that denies the tenets of their pernicious and insane belief. To call a person "a liar, fool, or knave" may be a strong and able argument to substantiate the claims of Spiritualism or religion (as it is used in the defense of both beliefs), but in the discussion of any other subjects it is only indulged in by those persons in whom the asinin propensities predominate.

In the various letters of Spiritualists in answer to Mr. Winter and others, I find they use a sort of stereotyped reply of the following import, "Liar, fool, bigot," and other pet names, and say they are "supremely ignorant," etc. Mr. Winter having given up writing, they hav transferred their endearing terms from him to me.

And now one A. Allen Noe, "Atheistic Spiritualist," says: "Brother Northup, I am after you." Whenever I hav anything to say I will write, and if the editor of this paper will print it I shall let the readers draw their own conclusions. I don't propose to open up a debate to gratify anyone that may see fit to call me a liar, or who may doubt my statement of a fact by saying, "Please tell us of one single person in the asylum to-day who was brought to a demented state of mind by and through the influence of Spiritualism." If I should present the case with affidavits it would not convince him.

If I should attempt a reply to his column of interrogatorics, even in shorthand, it would use up too much of the space allotted to "Letters from Friends," therefore I shall only notice a few points. He says, "I am emphatically a Liberal." So were John Calvin and Martin Luther, but their liberality did not wholly eradicate their former belief, so they were unable to use with any degree of decency those who doubted their peculiar belief "Tell me of a single brilliant intellect which has become beclouded by investigating the 'fanatical humbug.'" I refer him to the closing scenes in the life of Robert Dale Owen. In regard to its demoralizing tendency, I would call his attention to the many happy homes it has broken up, the divorces it has caused. For particulars I refer you to George Chainey, your latest convert. Again, he says, "You believe death ends all. Our orthodox friends believe we liv beyond the grave. Theirs is belief; so is yours."

How about that nonsense of becoming spirits after death, and roaming at large—is that a "belief" or not? Investigating Spiritualism for a third of a century at a cost of several hundred dollars, I should say was time and money wasted. How much better are you going to be after death than I, with all of your investigations? If it is true, I shall be there with you; if not, then your belief in an existence after death is as selfish and inconsistent as the Christians' belief. If he has read carefully all the articles written for your paper by Mr. Wettstein, and others, his questions to me hav been more than answered—which seems to hav done him no good, so that he will hav to excuse me from making the attempt to convert him.

The God-in-the-Constitution party, with the help of some Liberals, hav incorporated a Prohibitory clause in the constitution of this state, which has, so far, been the means of closing all the most respectable places, but the low groggeries are selling on the sly, and the people are ordering their beer by express from out of the state, so that, practically, nothing has been gained except higher taxes, and a decrease of business. L. L. NORTHUP, Materialist.

BUTLER, PA., July 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I send $3 to renew my subscription to your ennobling paper. I hav no fault to find. It has more reading-matter in it than I hav time to read.

I enjoy the pictures best of all. Let no friend of Freethought object to the pictures. They convey ideas much quicker and more accurately than reading. And thousands will get correct ideas that never would otherwise. Has not much of this unnatural superstition been fastened upon the minds of the people by pictures? Our churches are full of them, our family Bibles are illustrated with them, and long before the child can read he has the flood, the lions' den, the fiery furnace, the crucifixion, and the resurrection all in his mind, and is scared so bad with the pictures of hell, and the ram with seven heads and ten horns, that he wont't go to the kitchen alone in the dark to get a drink. And why should not pictures be used to ridicule and banish these foul ideas from the mind of our benighted race?

I hav a copy of "A Pictorial History of the Old Testament," published by H. S. Goodspeed, 37 Park Row, New York. These were printed as landmarks of biblical truth, to frame and hang up in the parlor to "lead children to their savior." Just listen to a few of them and imagin how they would confirm your faith: "Temptation," "Noah Entering the Ark," "Lot's Pillar of Salt," "Samson with the Gates of Gaza," "Two She-bears Eating the Children," and "Jonah Cast into the Sea"—the last three the same as you hav pictured in THE TRUTH SEEKER, only the style of one artist is to fasten superstition on the mind, while the other is to drive it away. Also, in this chart is the chariot of fire in which Elijah went up. It has two gray horses in it. I think Heston's geese look more appropriate. Here also is "The Three Hebrew Children and Daniel in the Lion's Den." Now, this is a Christ-ian picture, a fine engraving, a household God, framed, respected; children pointed to all these as Bible history, Bible truth, and the poor, innocent child looking out in tender youth with virgin eyes upon the world is told, "You must believe all these damnable lies or go to hell." I remember when I was a boy ten years of age, often the old hard-shell preacher visited my father's house to get his chicken. He was terribly interested in my spiritual welfare. I asked him a few childish questions, and instead of answering them he told me it was death to doubt, and had me write in the family Bible a verse that ends:

> Better he had ne'er been born
> That reads to doubt, or reads to scorn.

Thus it is that pictures, prose, poetry, persecution, pain, papers, preachers, popes, posters, pestilence, and perseverance hav been used for thousands of years to drive reason from his throne. But he still livs in the mind of every child. God help us to take the chains from Reason, the king of humanity.

Again, I hav before me a consolidated picture of events of the New Testament, published by the same house—a fine picture: "When Peter was come down out of the ship, he walked on the water;" "The angel came and rolled away the stone from the door and sat upon it;" also picture of the ascension, the "descent of the Holy Ghost," etc.

Then, I wish to call attention to a large picture, perhaps 30x40, sold in this county many years ago by a student of the ministry. It represents thousands ascending the hill of faith into everlasting glory, and tens of thousands get the cold shoulder, and the great redeemer says, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting punishment," and here is a picture of all men that don't believe all these unnatural and unbelievable things being cast into a burning lake of fire because of their unbelief.

The artist has done a great deal for good in making ridiculous false ideas in politics, and the illustrations in your paper are a two-edged sword that will carry conviction to the father and conversion to his grandchildren, and will be a mighty aid in the great work of placing reason on her natural throne.

Now, I suggest and request that all these pictures be published in a volume by themselvs, cheaply bound, for general preservation and circulation. And don't forget I am a subscriber for two copies of such a picture-book. The church needs one, and the state needs one. SIMEON NIXON.

P.S.—I take notice that in my haste in writing the above I hav a prayer in it: "God, help us to take the chains from Reason, the king of humanity." This is certainly blasphemy, irreverence, and ungentlemanly language toward our creator to order or request him to do what reason and experience teach us we must do ourselvs. S. N.

DECATUR, ILL., July 18, 286.

MR. EDITOR: As I am greatly intersted in the dissemination of Liberalism, I ask the privilege of offering a few suggestions in that direction.

My wide experience with people of every shade of thought has enabled me to discover that a very large per cent of the people of this country are very Liberally inclined, which is entirely due to the Liberal advancement of the secular press. But this only furnishes a very superficial idea of what true Liberalism really is. And here the secular press leave them standing helpless midway between orthodoxy and Liberalism; and there is, perhaps, not one in a thousand of these semi-Liberalized individuals who ever read or even ever saw—yes, we might be safe in saying, never even heard tell of—a Liberal paper, book, or periodical of any kind. But out of this great multitude who are helplessly struggling in the dark, many will privately wonder and ask themselvs, "Oh, where can I get more light? Is there nothing more pointed or substantial upon this subject other than the casual observance of the indifferent press? Hav I got to perish after having deserted the faith of my parents?" These individuals much remind me of a plant that has been taken from the earth and reset again, which is left unattended and to perish. This is no mere fancy of my own, but it was exactly my experience when I first made an effort to rid myself of the shackles that had imprisoned the free exercise of my brain from infancy.

About eighteen years ago, when I had first received a glimpse of the glorious light of Liberalism, I began to wonder and to make inquiry as to whether there was not a book or periodical of some kind that gave utterance in favor of such a sentiment. I was informed by a friend that there was a paper called the Boston Investigator that advocated such a sentiment, and my heart leaped with joy to be thus informed.

But right here I wish to inform the reader that if we wait for the slow tide of the natural development of the country to Liberalize the people, we will ultimately find it to be a very slow process. We must act by those that need Liberal assistance as Mohammed did by the mountain. He said if the mountain would not come to him, he would go to it. If the lukewarm Liberal, or, in other words, the cold Christian, will not come to us, we must go to him and lend him a helping hand.

Now, what I wish to suggest is this: Let there be a fund raised by the Liberals all over the country for the purpose of defraying the expenses of publishing tracts. Let these tracts treat upon about six of the most important subjects of Liberalism—say, for instance, as follows: "What Liberalism Offers in place of Christianity;" "The Decline of Faith;" "Is Man an Accountable Being?" "The Progress of Liberalism;" "Is Christianity Essential to Morality?" "Is the Bible Inspired?"

These tracts should not exceed four pages, for they would be used only as eye-openers which would prepare the reader for something more elaborate. The novice must hav something brief and concise or he will become wearied. At the bottom of the last page of each tract let there be advertised THE TRUTH SEEKER and a free catalog of books. Let these tracts be given away, not sold, and THE TRUTH SEEKER would double its present number of readers in one year, and besides sell twice as many books as at present. Hundreds of people, among the thousands that would read the advertisment of THE TRUTH SEEKER, would very likely say, "Well, I declare, I hav been wondering if there was not such a journal somewhere in existence." And after receiving his catalog, he would say, "Why, here is Paine's 'Age of Reason,' a book that I hav heard of ever since I was a child, and I shall send for it if it is the last thing I ever do." He will look his catalog through and mark the books he wants to send for in the future. After he gets a few books he will be so impressed with the sentiment that he will be going for every Christian that don't agree with himself. This is generally the action of a new convert. I don't approve of such actions altogether, but I don't know as it is injurious to our cause. These tracts should be issued by the hundred thousand, and let them be sent to every village, town, and city where there is a Liberal that can be relied upon; and the person receiving them should see that every family in his town should hav one. Every town receiving these tracts should get an equal number of each subject treated. There should be a distribution of the tracts about once a month for a few months. After that, about every three or six months. I hope that every Liberal paper in the United States will adopt this plan, for I am sure it will prove a success. I would like to hear from the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER upon this subject. M. L. SANDERS.

That is known as the Children's Hour."

How They Saved the Battery at Fort Duncan.

Well, yes, I lived in Texas in the spring of '61;
And I'll relate the story, though I fear, sir, when 'tis done,
'Twill be little worth your hearing; it was such a simple thing,
Unheralded in rondeaus that the grander poets sing.

There had come a guest unbidden, at the opening of the year,
To find a lodgment in our hearts; and the tenant's name was Fear.
For Secessia's dawning mandate was a call for men and arms,
And each recurring eventide but brought us fresh alarms.

They had notified the general that he must yield to fate,
And all the muniments of war surrender to the state;
But he sent from San Antonio an order to the sea
To convey on board the steamer all the fort's artillery.

Right loyal was his purpose; but the foe divined his plan,
And the wily Texans set a guard to intercept the man
Detailed to bear the message. They placed their watch with care,
That neither scout nor citizen should pass it unaware.

Well, this was rather awkward, sir, as doubtless you will say,
But the major, who was chief of staff, resolved to hav his way,
Despite the watchful provost-guard; so he asked his wife to send,
With a little box of knickknacks, a letter to her friend;
And the missiv held one sentence I remember to this day:
"The thread is for your neighbor, Mr. French, across the way."

He dispatched a youthful courier. Of course, as you will know,
The Texans searched him thoroughly, and ordered him to show
The contents of the letter. They read it o'er and o'er,
But failed to find the message they had hindered once before.

So it reached the English lady; and she wondered at the word,
But gave the thread to Major French, explaining that she'd heard
He wished a spool of cotton; and great was his surprise
At such a trifle, sent unasked, through leagues of hostil spies.

"There's some hidden purpose, doubtless, in this curious gift," he said.
Then he tore away the label, and inside the spool of thread
Was Major Nichol's order, bidding him convey to sea
All the arms and ammunition from Fort Duncan's battery.
"Down to Brazos speed your horses!" thus the major's letter ran;
"Shift equipments and munitions, and embark them if you can."

Yes, the transfer was effected; for the ship lay close at hand.
Ere the Texans guessed their purpose they had vanished from the land.
Do I know it for a fact, sir? 'Tis no story that I've read.
I was but a boy in war-time, and I carried him the thread.

Lost in the Woods.

CHAPTER I.

Charlie, Boise, and Dora started from home early on Monday morning to gather berries. They were going through a large wood, and just as Dora was picking up her fallen sunbonnet, she spied a large black-snake hidden among the bushes. At the sight of the snake Dora ran and screamed with all her might, and the boys (being as much frightened by her screams) ran after her as fast as their little legs could carry them. They ran so far that when they stopped they could not think where they were, and they began to realize that they were lost. They (being very thoughtful children) commenced to hunt for a path that might lead toward home. They wandered about in this manner for two hours, when Dora became frightened, and, sitting down, began to cry. Her brothers tried to comfort her, but she would not be comforted. All at once Boise cried out that he had found a path. Then the three children started out again in good cheer, only to be disappointed, for the path was merely a cow path and only went as far as a small creek. It began to grow dark and the children sat down on some moss to rest. Dora was very tired and cried, but after she laid her head on Charlie's knee she was soon in dreamland. The boys, being tired, soon fell asleep also.

While all this was occurring with the children, their parents were wondering why they did not return home, and when the shades of evening began to fall they grew very uneasy and started out to hunt for the children. They went as far as the woods together and then parted, one going one way through the woods, and the other another way. They were to meet at a certain place, and when they met neither one had heard or seen anything of the children. It was now quite dark, and they became greatly alarmed and went back and aroused the whole village. About one hundred men with lanterns started for the woods to hunt for the children. Twice they thought they heard Boise's voice answer their call, and they went in the direction it came from, but returned disappointed. At about ten o'clock a great thunder-storm came up. The thunder and lightning were terrible, and the men had to take shelter where they could find it. The storm lasted an hour and a half, and was just dreadful. The childrens' mother almost lost her reason during the storm, to think that her children were out in such a raging tempest. After the storm was over the men started in their pursuit again.

CHAPTER II.

We left the children sleeping. They slept until about half-past nine o'clock, when Charlie was aroused by a sudden noise, which sounded like somebody calling. He also heard a noise not far from him, but, fearing it was a panther, he became very much frightened. He noticed that it seemed to be going farther and farther away. Then he heard a call, "Char-lie! Char-lie! Cha-arlie!" It sounded very far from him. He tried to answer, but found that he had taken a cold in his throat, and could not speak above a whisper. Then he awakened Boise, and told him to answer. Boise answered, and that was what the men heard, but they were so far away that they could not tell the direction which it came from. After this the boys got quiet again, and were almost asleep when the storm awakened all of them. Boise and Dora began to cry, and Charlie started off with them to find some kind of shelter. He had not gone far when he found a large overcoat, which they discovered by the flashes of lightning to be their father's. Charlie got some logs and put the coat over them, so they all could get under. It made them feel much better to hav a covering overhead. During the storm the children saw a large tree fall which was struck by lightning, and it almost fell on them. This frightened them dreadfully, but the storm was soon over after this.

When it was over, the children fell asleep again, and slept very comfortably until morning. Dora awoke at sunrise, and awakened her brothers, and asked them where their mamma was. Then the boys reminded her of what had happened. The children were so hungry that they started out to hunt for something to eat. They came up to a fence, and then followed it for a mile, thinking they would soon see a house.

Before long they approached a log-house among some bushes. Charlie told the children to sit down and watch if any person might come out of this queer-looking place. In a little while the children saw an ugly old woman, with a very long nose and large, large black eyes crawl out of a hole in one side of the hut. When she espied the children, her eyes opened so wide that they thought she was a wild person.

She walked right up to them, and commenced talking. When she opened her mouth the children thought she was going to swallow them. Her teeth were as large as gourd-seeds, and her voice sounded like thunder. She asked them what they wanted there. Charlie told her that they were hungry, and wanted something to eat. She muttered something to herself, and, turning round laughing, beckoned them to follow her. The children were afraid to obey her, but were more afraid not to obey her, lest she she might hurt them. They followed her, and she led them up to the house, opened a door, and bade them enter. It looked very dark inside, but they obeyed her, and she went in after them and closed the door. It was so dark at first that the children could not see anything, but after a while they noticed a small hole in the roof of the hut. They saw a large fire burning, with a kettle over it. The kettle was filled with boiling water. She told them that she always burned or scalded all little children who came in her way. This frightened the children so that they screamed loudly. The woman ran at Boise and lifted him, and just then there was a loud rap at the door, and she let Boise fall. She hurried and crawled out of the hole, as a kind-looking gentleman entered in at the door.

He asked where the woman was and what she had been doing. Charlie told him, and the man said she was a bad woman, and that she had caught several children before to kill them, and he had rescued them. The man then asked them how they came to be so far out in the woods. They told him how they had been lost, and how hungry they were. He said he would soon get them something to eat if they would go home with him. They willingly did so, for they were glad to meet with somebody so kind.

CHAPTER III.

The men from the village hunted for the children for the remainder of the night without any traces of them whatever. About eight o'clock in the morning they came up to the place where the children had their father's coat spread over the logs. They thought that it might hav been the children who made such a queer-looking shelter to protect them from the storm. Just then the children's father espied his coat, and he cried out that it belonged to him, and he said he must hav dropped it the night before. They then discovered small footprints in the clay, for it had been made soft by the rain. They followed these footprints up to the fence and all along it until they came to the place where the children had sat down. Here they lost the tracks, but were hunting for more, when they heard a loud scream. They looked up and there saw the hut, from whence the scream came. They were crossing the fence to go up to the hut, when they heard a noise at the door of the hut, and there saw a man standing, knocking. This caused them to stop and watch what would follow. Very soon the old woman crept out of the hole in the side of the hut, and they noticed the man went in at the door at the same time. The men then hid themselvs to watch what would happen next. The woman ran off into the woods, and some of the men ran after her, but she went so fast that they could not overtake her, so they soon returned to the others. After the man went into the hut, the other men could hear him talking to somebody. He soon came out leading the children, and the men recognized them right away. They jumped up and cried out that there were the lost children! The noise they made by yelling frightened the children, for they thought it was the woman back after them, and they screamed and held to the man's coat. The man, thinking it was the woman who had come back with some men to steal the children, did not take time to look around, but hurried the children to a wagon that he had standing outside of the fence, and drove off as fast as he possibly could.

The men started after him in different ways thinking to head him off. They went about two miles, when six of the men got in front of him and commanded him to stop his horses. He stopped, and then the men explained to him about the children. The man said that he was very glad to hav rescued the children and found their friends so soon. He said the creature in the hut was a very bad woman, and he had tried to catch her several times, but she would always hide when she knew he was near her.

The other parties soon came up to the man, and the father almost went crazy over the children. Some of the men, with the children's father, got into the wagon with the strange man and they drove off for the village. When they reached the village their mother ran out and held the children in her arms, and cried over them so much that, with her worrying about them while lost, she was sick for a week afterward. When she recovered she never would allow her children to go for berries again.

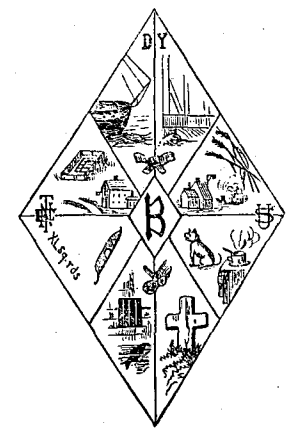
Praise the Boy.

It often costs one quite a struggle to do his simple duty; and when one does his simple duty in spite of his temptations to do differently, he deserves credit for so doing. One has no need to liv long in this world before finding out this truth. A bright little boy about two and a half years old recently showed that he apprehended it. He was on the eve of doing something that was very tempting to him.

"No, my son; you musn't do that," said his father.



The little fellow looked as if he would like to do it in spite of his father's prohibition; but he triumphed over his inclination, and answered resolutely, "All right, papa; I won't do it."

There was no issue there, and the father turned to something else. The boy waited a minute, and then said, in a tone of surprised inquiry: "Papa, why don't you tell me, 'That's a good boy?'"

The father accepted the suggestion, and commended his son accordingly. A just recognition of a child's well-doing is a parent's duty, even though the child's well-doing ought not to hinge on such a recognition. And as with little folks, so with larger ones. Just commendation is every one's duty.

Correspondence.

CORNPLANTER, July 21, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I never hav written to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I thought I would now try my hand at writing.

I am a little girl ten years old. I went to school this summer, but school is out now; it has been out for two or three weeks. I hav two sisters and one brother; their names are Maude, Anna, and Reade.

Well, I guess I will close for this time. I will write a longer letter next time.

From your loving friend,

FANNY B. MORRISON.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., July 23, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My name is Gracie. I attend school. I am in the third room. I love my teacher dearly. Papa keeps a confectionery store. I can sell peaches, pears, and candy for papa. THE TRUTH SEEKER just came in. We all like it. We were glad to find Sister Lulu's letter in your department. Religion, God, and the devil seem to be the watchwords here at papa's store. If there is a God, I guess that he will not harm any of his poor, innocent creatures. I don't believe there is a devil, but the Christians do, so they say. I hav a little brother who is five years old. You ought to hear him talk to the Christians. He likes Ingersoll and so do I, and we like all Freethought people. I shall thank you for your favor. Good-bye.

GRACIE BELE NEIHART.

[Gracie will please accept our thanks for a cunning little ring she sent us in her letter. It is rather small for our smallest finger, but we will keep it as a remembrance of her.—ED. C. C.]

Mottoes for Freethinkers

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND, THE ONLY TORCH OF PROGRESS.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Poetry.

Growth.

How would I grow? Not like the vine,
Though beautiful and full of grace,
Close clinging to its resting-place,
Where leaf and blossom intertwine.

For tendrils break when winds are high;
The best supports, in time, will fail.
And what can weak vine strength avail
When bruised and torn on earth I lie?

But like the tree—oh, tall and fair!
With roots deep reaching through the ground,
With branches spreading far around,
Drawing all good from earth and air.

Drawing all good that I may giv
Of my abundance friendly aid
To all who seek my pleasant shade,
Or in my screening branches liv;

That when this term of life is past,
And I am severed to the ground,
My growth may all so firm be found
That much of good will life outlast.

—Laura Garland Carr.

Every-Day Work.

Great deeds are trumpeted; loud bells are rung,
And men turn round to see;
The high peaks echo to the pæans sung
O'er some great victory.
And yet great deeds are few. The mightiest men
Find opportunities but now and then.

Shall one sit idly through long days of peace,
Waiting for walls to scale,
Or lie in port until some Golden Fleece
Lures him to face the gale?
There's work enough. Why idly then delay?
His work counts most who labors every day.

A torrent sweeps down the mountain's brow
With foam and flash and roar;
Anon its strength is spent—where is it now?
Its one short day is o'er.
But the clear stream that through the meadow flows
All the long summer on its mission goes.

Better the steady way; the torrent's dash
Soon leaves its rent track dry.
The light we love is not the lightning flash
From out the midnight sky,
But the sweet sunshine, whose familiar ray
From its calm throne of blue lights every day.

The sweetest lives are those to duty wed,
Whose deeds, both great and small,
Are close-knit strands of an unbroken thread,
Where love ennobles all.
The world may sound no trumpets, ring no bells;
The Book of Life the shining story tells.

Adami and Heva.

A REPLY TO WM. EMMETTE COLEMAN'S CRITICISM OF MY LETTER ON S. P. PUTNAM'S POEM BEARING THE ABOVE TITLE.

About two weeks ago I received a marked copy of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, of Chicago, containing an article written by Mr. Wm. Emmette Coleman, bearing the title of "The Alleged Hindoo Legend of Adam and Eve." I was very busy at the time, and could not giv the matter any attention, but as I intended to make a short visit to Rockaway Beach, I jotted down a few notes on the subject to take with me. After delivering a bi-centennial address before our society last Sunday evening, I took the first train bound for New York and arrived here early on Monday morning. After a few days' exercise, amusement, and surf-bathing, I now feel in a condition healthy and hearty enough—though without any books to refer to—to attempt a reply to Mr. Coleman's article. I hav not had the pleasure of reading many of Mr. Coleman's literary productions, but from what I hav read I had supposed he was what is generally termed a Liberal or skeptical writer. That is, that he was an opponent of orthodoxy.

The reason I make this allusion is that I do not think it is courteous, honorable, or judicious for one Liberal to make indiscriminate attacks on another, or for any person to criticise articles or books written by no matter whom, in a coarse, ungentlemanly manner. Now, I do not desire to be understood as in any manner trying to discourage free discussion and well-intentioned criticism—particularly the latter—by those who are well qualified by disposition and intellectual acquirements. I read many articles published in Liberal journals which I sometimes think I might criticise, but I always leave that to those who hav more leisure than I and can take greater pleasure in that kind of work or amusement than I can. Therefore, under these circumstances, I would not hav attempted a reply to the article referred to were it not that the writer in his article on "Adam and Eve" embodies in it an extract from a letter written by me and published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 6, 1886. Before entering on a discussion of the merits of the article as a whole. I desire to state that I received a copy of Mr. Putnam's poem entitled "Adami and Heva" in the latter part of February, and after reading it over carefuly, I sat down and wrote the letter referred to in a very few minutes, without giving the matter a particle of consideration. As I was unable to find THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 6th before I left home, I will not state that the extract from my letter contained in Mr. Coleman's article is not correct as published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. But I certainly did not intend to write Sanscrit "nation." "Nations" is the word I must hav intended to use, as that only could express the idea I intended to convey. The word "horror" printed in the extract is still worse. That should hav been "honor." [Omitting the final s from "nations" is Mr. Coleman's error. The TRUTH SEEKER types are undoubtedly responsible for the word "horror" occupying the place of honor.] Let me now reproduce the extract with the corrections I hav just made, with Mr. Coleman's opening reference and criticism:

As evidence of the manner in which this book is regarded by its readers, attention is invited to the following notice thereof by an intelligent and activ Freethinker, Mr. J. J. McCabe, of Albany, N. Y., published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 6, 1886: "It is a poetic version of the old Asiatic fiction which inspired the founders of the Sanscrit nations to deeds of patience, valor, exploration, honor, virtue, and marital love and fidelity. This aspirational fiction, the outcome and evidence of sage and varied experience, refined and virtuous manhood, was in after ages plagiarized, corrupted, and adopted by a nation of polygamists who were rooted by inheritance to a land of sterility, whose imperial priesthood pressed the yoke of ignominious servitude on the shoulders of an ignorant and superstitious people. It ought to become a companion book to Mr. Arnold's 'Light of Asia.'" No intelligent person need be told the foregoing is absurdly false from beginning to end. It manifests great ignorance to call the Hebrews a race of polygamists in contradistinction to the Hindoos. Polygamy was practiced to a extent among both peoples, and the Hindoo sacred books giv far greater sanction to polygamy than can be found anywhere in the Hebrew scripture. How absurd to talk of the monogamous Hindoo legend being corrupted by the polygamous Hebrew, in the face of the fact that the Hebrew story of Adam and Eve is strictly monogamous. It represents God as saying, "I will make him [the man] an help meet for him"—one and one only. It narrates the creation of one woman only from a rib of the man, and then the man says "therefore shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave unto his wife; and they shall be one flesh,"—that is, one wife, and the two, one man and one woman, shall be one flesh. This passage teaches monogamy plainly, for if man had more than one wife, the expression, "he and his wife shall be one flesh," would be inapplicable. Nothing is said in the Bible of Adam having another wife, and as the woman is named Eve, "because she was the mother of all living," it is plain that the Bible intends to teach that the whole human race sprang from a monogamous marriage. Mr. McCabe's remarks about the beautiful Sanskrit legend being corrupted by polygamists is in the highest degree absurd. Contrast the condition of woman in India at present and through the ages with that of woman among the Hebrews both in ancient and modern times. And with regard to the despotism of the priesthood, nowhere on earth probably has there been such an arrogant priesthood "pressing the yoke of ignominious servitude on the shoulder of an ignorant and superstitious people" as were and are the Brahmans of India. The regulations of the Hebrew priestly code sink into insignificance, as regards despotism and galling, crushing tyranny, when compared with the ancient Brahmanic code of Manu or the caste regulations in operation in India to-day. To cap the climax of absurdity, the recommendation is made that Mr. Putnam's "Adami and Heva," an exaggerated version of the nineteenth-century forgery, bearing a partly spurious title ("Adami" instead of "Adima"), should be greeted as a companion volume to Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia," a poetic version of genuin Buddhistic legends.

Now, with regard to the comparison drawn by the writer between the Hindoos and Hebrews, let me state first that I did not refer to the Hindoos or Hebrews of the present day, or any other day within considerably more than two thousand years. I referred to the ancient historic Hebrews, and to those Sanscrit people that carried civilization, with all its ennobling benefits, to the shores of the Mediterranean. But I more particularly intended to convey the idea that the beautiful Asiatic fiction about the first man and woman was a most important factor in the evolution of that bold, enterprising, rational spirit of manhood which one sees so richly and conspicuously manifested in the early history of Greece. If the science of philology, as expounded by its greatest teachers, is of any value to mankind, we certainly must believe that the Greeks were a Sanscrit people. And in this connection I might remark that the stories which hav come down to us of Hercules and Orion are corrupted and exaggerated editions of the "Asiatic" fiction referred to. I think also that Mr. Coleman will admit that the Greeks were a monogamous people in the same sense that we would say that the great majority of men in Europe and America are monogomous. With regard to the "polygamous Hebrews," whom the gentleman seems to be so much interested in, I merely took it for granted that the Jewish priest, Ezra, in revising or writing the history of his own people, would not make them appear more polygamous than they were. Certainly the monogomous character of David, Solomon, Hezekiah, and many others of the Lord's anointed, is apparent to the most superficial reader. In relation to the power and influence excrcised by the Hindoo as compared with the Hebrew priesthood, I will say this much: The Hindoo priest had a fixed place in the body politic, but every time the Jewish priest had an opportunity he was an autocratic dictator, both in civil and religious affairs. There is nothing that exemplifies the barbarous effect that the Bible story of the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden has had on the Hebrew mind so well, even down to our own time, as the total ostracism of a Jew, by his relativs and co-religionists, who has dared to obey the promptings of his higher nature in marrying a person outside of his own religious persuasion. The influence of the Catholic priesthood, particularly the Irish portion of it, has always been very powerful and damnable in its effect in this regard, but it is only skin deep when compared with this fossilized priestly-stamped instrument of sectarian proscription as practiccd by our Hebrew neighbors and fellow-citizens.

The monogamous lesson taught in the Garden of Eden story had as much influence on the life actions of the historic Jew as the Christian injunction, "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof," has had upon the life actions of the ordinary Christian. The best Hebrews held the monogamous example of Adam and Eve in the same estimation that the best Christians hold the imperativ Christian injunction which I hav just cited. If, as the gentleman pretends to think, the influence of the Hindoo priest has been so potential a factor in Asiatic society, why has it not engrafted itself on the civil arm of government throughout Asia? There has always been religious liberty throughout all India and China.

But if the influence of the Brahmanic class has been somewhat powerful within the last two thousand years, it has certainly been exercised in the development of peace and noncombativness. No so with the Hebrew priesthood. They were always the fiery and fanatic advocates of war and desolation. Look at the last insane and bloody act of the Rabbi Equiba in putting the Rod of Command in the hand of Bar Chasbor, which almost caused the utter annihilation of the Hebrew race. One word more in regard to the importance to be attached to the passage in Genesis, "Therefore shall a man leave father and mother and cleave to his wife." The whole legal force of this beautiful injunction is destroyed by the practical teachings of the Levitical Code, and by the priestly indorsed murders of the youthful Phineas. Let us now take a few extracts from the Code of Menu on this subject: "Then only is a man perfeet when he consists of three persons united, his wife, himself, and his son, and thus hav learned Brahmans announced this maxim: 'The husband is even one person with his wife.' 'Neither by sale nor desertion can a wife be released from her husband.' Thus we fully acknowledge the law enacted of old by the Lord of creation." There are many enactments which forbid a man to sell his daughter under pretext of gratuity. I will cite the following: "Never, even in former creations, hav we heard the virtuous approve the tacit sale of a daughter for a price under the name of nuptial gratuity." "Let mutual fidelity continue till death; this, in few words, may be considered as the supreme law between husband and wife." I will now take the idea which is conveyed to us in one of the above quotations from the Code of Menu, as a text to cover much that will follow. It is this: "Never in former creations." Throughout all that part of the world which is embraced in Thibet, India, Hindostan, and China, there is no appreciable difference in the legendary account of the cosmology of the world. The Lamist, Brahmist, and Confucian accounts are nearly the same. There doesn't appear to be much difference between the ever-returning cycles of the Confucians and the Kalpas of the Hindoos. The order is as follows: The world is first formed from chaos, and the first man is born from this ovum mundi. After a certain period the world is destroyed and returns to chaos. Then after another period of time has elapsed it springs forth from chaos again. The first man reappears, and a new world similar to the former one and peopled by the same inhabitants is called into being. The death and reappearance of the same individual in every recurring cycle is, of course, apparently of Chinese origin. And I might here state that although the name of the first man may change, etymologically speaking, every time he reappears at the beginning of each cycle or Kalpa, yet he is the same person whether you call him in Chinese Shang-te (their Adam) or Fuh-he (their Noah), or in the Brahmanic and Hindoo accounts, Satyvrata, Swayambhuva, Adima (their Adam), or Menu (their Adam and Noah), or by any of the various names that hav been given to the Hindoo avatars. In the Mexican account they hav Coxcox for their Xisuthu, or first man, and their Noah goes by the same and various other names. By way of diversion it might not be uninteresting to the general reader to inform him that the Mexican traditions are very minute in the specification of the period of time embraced in each cycle or age of the world.

Four times, according to Mexican mythology, has the earth been destroyed. The first age lasted 5,206 years; the second, 4,804 years; the third, 4,010; and the fourth lasted 4,008 years. This came to an end by a great inundation which destroyed all mankind except one man, Coxcox, and his wife, Xachiquetzal, who saved themselvs in the hollow trunk of a tree. Let us compare the Mexican myth with the Hebrew myth, as we find it in Genesis. For the first age or cycle we hav Adam and Eve; for the second, Noah and his wife without a name; for the third, Abram and his wife Sarah; for the fourth, Moses—he is also a kind of Noah because he was saved from the water—and his nameless wife.

But perhaps Mr. Coleman may say that I am not confining myself strictly to the question at issue. Well, as an apology for the latitude I hav taken, I will remark that there is one fact that has impressed me very much both in my own practical experience with men of my acquaintance who pass as philologists, and those also who hav given their whole attention, in a professional manner, to the study and translation of the dead languages, that there are but few real or would-be philologists who seem to hav any respect for the facts that hav been demonstrated through the agency of archeology and the various branches of physical science.

Mr. Coleman appears to regard Max Muller as a philological pope. And as all things can be proved, such as the origin of matter, and the physical universe, and the most remote history of man, with his relations to the past, present, and future, by the examination of a few books which were written in languages which are now dead (although not very old when compared with the age of man), therefore, what he does not know on all subjects is not worth knowing.

He seems to regard Max Muller's strictures on Jacolliot as a devout Catholic would the pope's anathema against an arch heretic. Now let us see if I hav attempted to mislead in my criticism of philologists generally, not excepting Max Muller. Hear what Mr. Muller says after the recitation of a little poem from the Rig-Veda. The poem opens as follows: "Wise and mighty are the works of him who stemmed asunder the wide firmaments," etc. "This poem alone," says Max Muller, "is worth more to the student of history than all the the dynastics of Babylon and Egypt, worth more than all lucustrine villages, worth more than the skulls and jawbones of Neanderthal or Abbeville." Further illustration is unnecessary.

The essays of Francis Wilford, the most indefatigable oriental student of the last century, are referred to by the gentleman, and the great importance that should be attached to his confession that he and Sir William Jones were imposed upon by mercenary pundits. Wilford and Sir William were both excellent Sanscrit scholars. They had the advantage of Max Muller and many others of being on the historic ground of India. It is very singular that they could not tell by the least critical examination of a manuscript whether new leaves had been inserted. Now, may not the confession of Francis Wilford be something like the confession of Galileo, providing there ever was such a confession? But Mr. Coleman may say that the best evidence in the world of it is in the facts demonstrated in Max Muller's full English translation of the East India Company's collection of Sanscrit manuscripts. Well, let us examin this question a litle further. When Mr. Muller went to the city of Paris, after acquiring some reputation as a young Sanscrit scholar, he met Eugene Burnof, at that time one of the most learned men in France. At Burnof's solicitation, Muller agreed to take upon himself—being a young man—the labor of examining and comparing the French and English collections of Sanscrit manuscripts, for the purpose of editing a French translation of the Vedas and Commentaries. Mr. Muller went to England to examin the East India Company's collection, and while there was prevailed on to stay in England and edit an English translation from the manuscripts at hand.

EX-SPEAKER ERWIN of the New York legislature who last winter opposed the bill to tax church property managed to get a measure through which exempted from taxation $63,000,000 worth of property belonging to insurance companies. How Governor Hill happened to sign such a bill is a mystery which the Finance Committee of this city will shortly investigate.

A SCHOONER with eleven pleasure-seekers on board capsized in a squall off Sandy Hook Friday, July the 30th. Six women and one young man in the cabin were unable to escape and died from slow drowning or suffocation. Those on deck when the squall struck clung to the boat and were rescued. The victims were residents of Philadelphia, whither their bodies were taken Sunday.

PARSON DOWNS, Boston's indicted pastor, exploded what he called a bombshell in his church last Sunday. It was a letter which he read from a female member of the Bowdoin Square church, confessing that she had been guilty of adultery with a respectable deacon of the same church. Mr. Downs promises that he will make the Bowdoin Square Baptists very sick if they do not cease their persecutions. He has other damaging matter in reserve.

Odds and Ends.

AN enterprising reporter, writing up a wreck at sea, stated that no less than four of the crew and passengers bit the dust.

DURING the Sunday dinner the family were discussing the unusually fine sermon of the morning, when little Freda, aged five, declared that she remembered the text. Upon being asked to repeat it, she electrified the table by triumphantly quoting, with marked emphasis on the first word, "Hang all the law and the prophets!"

VERY wrong.—Bertie: "It's very wrong, ma, to tell a falsehood, isn't it?" Mater: "Of course it is, dear." B.: "And it's wicked to ask a boy to tell lies?" M.: "Why, yes." B.: "Well, that's what my teacher made me do to-day." M.: "Gracious me! made you tell a lie, Bertie?" B.: "Yes, mamma, she made me promis to be always a good boy in future."

A NEW YORKER was asking after a Wisconsin county treasurer who defaulted three or four years ago, and was answered, "Oh, the people hav concluded to drop the case." "Feel sorry for him, eh?" "Well, you see, he used $2,000 of the funds to speculate on. Had he won he was calculating to buy bells for three different churches. You can't really go back on a man whose zeal for the Lord allowed Chicago to get the bulge on him."

DURING the services at a prayer-meeting in an Indiana hamlet lightning struck and burnt the barn of a farmer in attendance. He felt sore over the fact, and asked the minister how it was that he should be punished for serving God. "Brother Jones," was the reply, "I can't exactly make it out myself. You were there, and I saw you, and the Lord saw you, and it must be that thunderbolt went wrong by some mistake. Your barn and that of old Si Jones look so much alike that the Lord got mixed and let flicker at the wrong institution."

"YES," said the parson at the tea-table, "young Jordan was out driving with Miss Popinjay the other evening and his horse ran away. They were both thrown out and the buggy was smashed to pieces. It was a providential escape for both of them; but I can't understand how the young man came to lose control." "He must hav been driving with one hand," flippantly suggested the minister's eldest son, a rake of a boy. "Or perhaps he had the reins around his neck," said Edith, a shy young beauty of sixteen, with a charmingly modest mien. And then everybody exclaimed in chorus, "Why, Edith!"

THE Koran is as toilsome reading as ever I undertook. A wearisome, confused jumble, crude, incondit; endless iterations, long-winded ness, entanglement; most crude, incondit; insupportable stupidity, in short-Nothing but a sense of duty could carry any European through the Koran.—Carlyle. [Is it possible that Carlyle got his style of writing from the incomparable Bible of Mohammed?]

THE inequality with which worldly goods are distributed is fearful. It begins, not with human institutions, but with nature, which metes out to us health, strength, intellect accidental advantages, if on any principle, on some principle different from distributiv justice. Civilization, on the whole, reduces it; a weak savage in primeval wilds, before the name of rent or capital was heard, felt his inferiority to his stronger mate more keenly than poverty in a civilized state feels its inferiority to wealth.—Toronto Bystander.

IF a hell could, it possible for a moment, it would seem but just that the class of men who hav invented and promulgated these falsehoods and damned the world with them for so many centuries should for a limited period be made to endure its severity in a mild form; but it would be too horrible even for that class of great offenders. Where is there a being so unfeeling and vindictiv as to remand one poor mortal to the torments of hell, whatever may hav been his offense?—Bennett's Fear of Death.

FOR what purpose would God perform a miracle? To accomplish some peculiar design upon living beings? He would then, in reality, be supposed to say, "I hav not been able to effect by my construction of the universe, by my divine decrees, by my eternal laws, a particular object; I am now going to change my eternal ideas and immutable laws to endeavor to accomplish what I hav not been able to do by means of them." This would be an avowal of his weakness, not of his power; it would appear in such a being an inconceivable contradiction. Accordingly, therefore, to dare to ascribe miracles to God is, if man can in reality insult God, actually offering him an insult. It is saying to him, "You are a weak and inconsistent being." It is, therefore, absurd to believe in miracles; it is, in fact, dishonoring the divinity.—Voltaire.

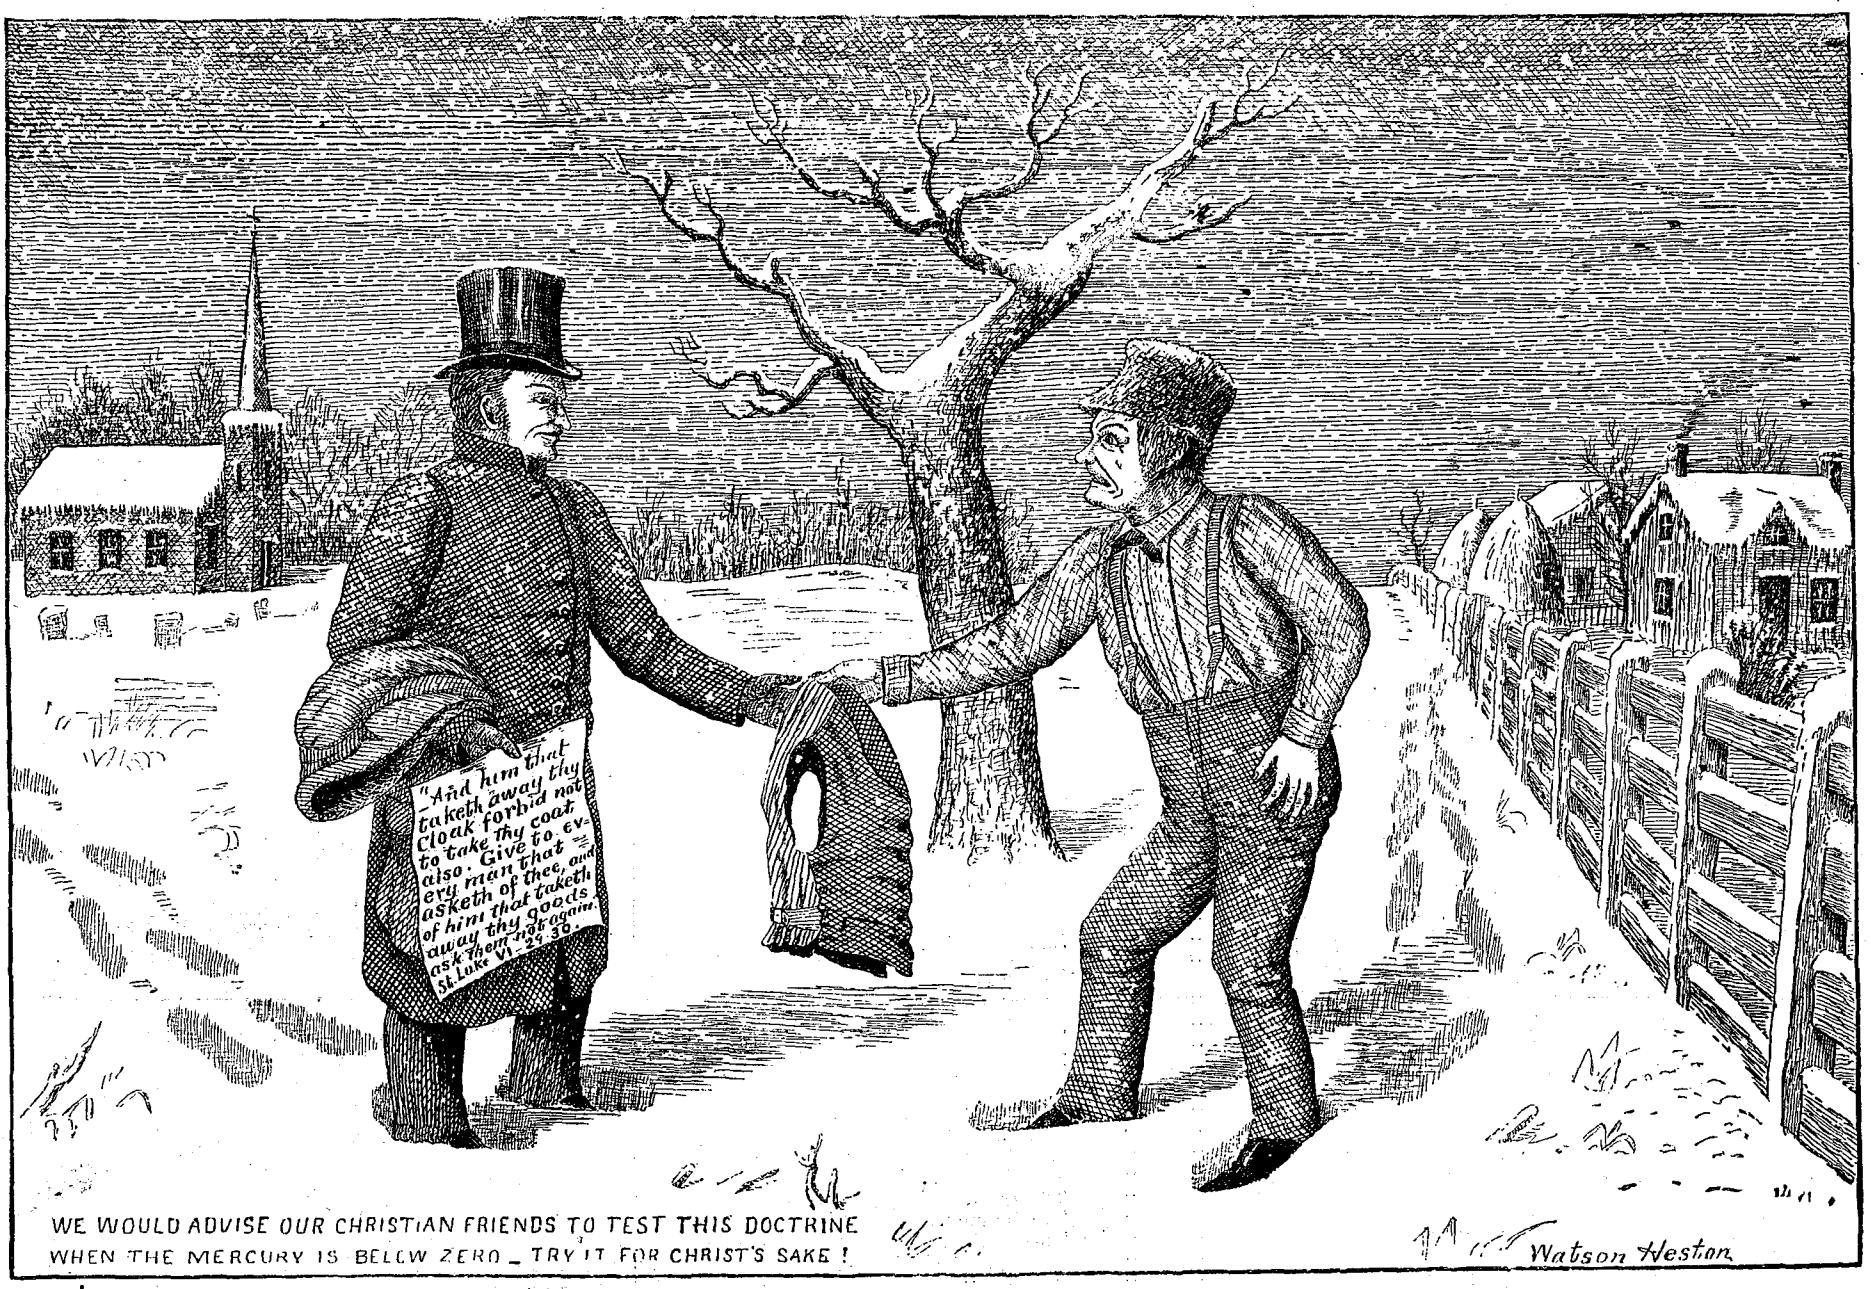
THANKS to Darwin, Spencer, Huxley; thanks to the geologists, antiquarians, and comparativ mythologists, the theological, sin-laden, Eden-cursed Adam has beat a retreat into the night of the past; and we trust he has taken a good deal of his theological baggage with him. There are encouraging signs of to-day that, with the disappearance of Adam, the artificial theology which was built on his shoulders—the doctrin of a fallen world, an angry, vindictiv God, and a yawning pit of hell and the fictitious righteousness which was necessary to neutralize it—will all vanish into forgetfulness or be preserved only as relics of archaic thought.—Christian Register.

ONE OF US TWO.

The day will dawn when one of us shall hearken
In vain to hear a voice that has grown dumb;
And morns will fade, noons pale, and shadows darken,
While sad eyes watch for feet that never come.

One of us two must some time face existence
Alone with memories that but sharpen pain,
And these sweet days shall shine back in the distance
Like dreams of summer dawns in nights of rain.

One of us two, with tortured heart half-broken,
Shall read long-treasured letters thro' salt tears;
Shall kiss with anguished lips each cherished token
That speaks of these love-crowned delicious years.



One of us two shall find all light, all beauty,
All joy on earth, a tale forever done;
Shall know henceforth that life means only duty—
O God! O God! hav pity on that one!

Notes and Clippings.

THE white people of Mississippi are generally in favor of Prohibition, but they are swamped by the overwhelming vote of the negroes in the state.

BEES in Oakland, Ill., drove a minister and his congregation out of church on a recent Sunday. The congregation were filled with anger at the sacrilegious bees, but consoled themselvs with the fact that the occurrence took place before the plate was passed.

A CHESTNUT street miss of less than five summers, who was playing in the yard and observing the works of nature, surprised her father the other day with the following questions and original conclusion: "Papa, does God make the worms?" "Yes, daughter." "Pa, does God make the hopper toad to eat the worms up?" "I s'pose so." "Well, I should like to know what he bothered his head with the worms for if he had to make the hopper toad to eat them."

HE is a priest, and one Friday he had been giving his congregation a rasping gallop over the mortification and flesh course. Arrived at home, hungry as a wolf, he rang the bell for luncheon, and anon the new servant made her appearance, and weighed in with a small plate of bread and butter, and two hard-boiled eggs. "Why, how now, Bridget," inquired the holy man, "is this a fitting meal to set before your master?" "If you please, sir," said the girl, "I was in chapel this morning and heard your sermon, and oh! it was beautiful, and you told us how we ought to starve ourselvs on a Friday, and—" "Bridget," interrupted her master, "did you ever go to a dancing party?" "Yes, your reverence." "And you hav observed the guests figuring on the floor, whilst up above sit the orchestra, who play the music for the others to dance to?" "Yes, your reverence." "Very well, then, Bridget, recollect in the future that I am the orchestra."

MINISTER (to deacon): "How were you pleased, Brother Jones, with my sermon yesterday on the sin of betting on elections?" Deacon Jones: "Well-er, to be frank with you, I didn't like it at all." Minister: "No?" Deacon Jones: "No, sir. I'm in hats, you know, and there's very little money in the business as it is."

THE recent death of Dexter A. Hawkins will call attention to the pamphlet which he wrote a few years ago, entitled, "The Roman Catholic Church in New York City and the Public Money and Public Property of the People." The pamphlet exposes the venality of the church of Rome in this city as it was never exposed before or since. Mr. Hawkins was a Methodist, and the Methodist Book Concern sells his pamphlet for five cents per copy.

WE are swinging very far from the original policy of our government. We began by trusting the individual man to take care of himself, burdening him as little as possible with taxes and laws. Little by little we are getting away from our original theory. We are beginning to depend upon corporations to carry on a great variety of enterprises. Our schools are supported or subsidized by the states. Prohibitionists demand that our appetites shall be regulated by law. Greenbackers want the government to assume the function of making money, instead of merely coining it. The Knights of Labor hav vast schemes of government interference to regulate wages and recast the statutes so as to do away with the natural operation of the law of supply and demand. Paternalism is rampant with a thousand schemes by which men are to be educated, employed, or pensioned by the state. The progress of these centralizing tendencies must soon be arrested or great mischiefs will ensue. We are governed too much.—Philadelphia Record.

As a matter of downright, cold fact, "the little busy bee" works but about three hours a day, and is a most thoroughgoing loafer the rest of the time. Its reputation for sobriety is as little deserved. Its propensity for the bowl, indeed, has become a source of grievance for bee-keepers. Wherever hives are kept in the neighborhood of a cider-mill the bees always neglect their work, go off and get full, stay out at night, and get boisterous and disorderly.

MR. SHELDON JACKSON, superintendent of the department of education in Alaska, has provided temperance text-books for use in all the schools of that distant territory, and teachers will be required to giv regular instruction as to the effects of alcohol and narcotics on the human frame. With parents and guardians left free to decide whether their children or wards should receive instruction of this sort, Superintendent Jackson's scheme would be a very good one.

THE Investigator people, always enterprising, hav established a lectureship, of which Mr. L. K. Washburn is to be the agent. By this plan it is intended that Mr. Washburn, backed by the lecture fund, shall be enabled to speak wherever expenses and a slight remuneration can be raised. Mr. Washburn is an able speaker and writer. We wish him success, but must warn him to avoid New Jersey. As yet the religious people of that state hav not all felt the softening amenities of civilization.

AN Irishman had taken his wife and childer down to the theater to see "Shane na Lawn." The family went in for whole-hearted enjoyment and seemed to be as keenly interested in the fortunes of the dramatis personæ as if their environment were a part of the stern reality of life. After the play was over they took a Third avenue elevated train for home up in Duffyville. Bad luck to it all! The shanty was no more. The fire fiend had indeed entered the McFadden domain and swept it clear. Mrs. McFadden and the brood of homeless childer shed tears, and even McFadden, after the first shock had subsided, trembled with grief when reciting the details of his calamity. Facts About the New Testament.

Origen, one of the early church writers, says: "Not only four gospels, but many, were written, out of which those we hav were chosen and delivered to the churches." It is left for the Christian to decide whether these quarreling bishops and church dignitaries, who so much disgraced the early church councils by wringing each other's noses, selected the right ones. Perhaps the Lord directed the choice. But when it came to fighting and breaking bones, one would think the "other fellow" gave directions in some of the councils.

Mr. Sunderlin says: "At least three of the gospels could hav had no real authors, as we understand that term, being compilations made up of legendary elements." Waite says: "The date of the Christian era is based upon the birth of Christ as given by Matthew, which is a legend of little value. "It is agreed that Jesus was born at least four years before the Christian era. It may hav been fourteen, and it may hav been twenty. Some of the early writers claim that he was an old man when he died, and was in the ministry over fifty years." And he further says: "The accounts of the resurrection as given in the New Testament, confused and irreconcilable as they are, cannot be looked upon as historic. They were written in the second century to supply a need in the church, and the doctrin of the crucified body of Christ cannot be traced beyond that date." And further, that "Marcion compiled the most ancient gospel manuscripts which he could find, and the church, to a considerable extent, used the same materials."

Luke is the oldest gospel of the New Testament. He drew largely from Marcion, and that he used other and older fragments of different authors is evident. Indeed, it is admitted flatly in the introduction of that gospel by the author, whoever he may hav been, that he was only a transcriber, for he says that his object is to "set forth what had been delivered unto him."

Schleiermacher says that "the gospel of Luke was drawn from over thirty different sources." Jerome says that "the gospel of Luke was published according to the Egyptians, and Thomas, and Matthias, and Bartholomew, and the Hebrews, and Basilides, and Apelles, and others which it would be tedious to mention, showing that whoever compiled the gospel of Luke drew from all these sources." Apelles wrote about the year 160, long after the apostles had been quietly sleeping in their graves. Of course, this robs the gospel of Luke of its apostolic origin. Waite says: "It is impossible to name the author of this gospel."

Why should not the people be made acquainted with these facts that they may form an enlightened opinion for themselvs? It may be the means of throwing a lot of priests and ministers out of buttery positions, but they will find an open field; the ax and the anvil, the saw and the spade, will respond to their touch, and one would think by giving their heroism "a brush" they might get an honest living.

Could we see all the gospels which hav been written; could we compare them and see how one gospel has been taken from another; could we understand what a mania there was for so-called sacred writings, how they multiplied and how many were engaged in writing them, what an anxiety was manifested on the part of authors to hav their writings adopted by the churches; could we understand how these writings were manipulated and tinkered by the translators and transcribers, and other interested parties, we would never speak of them as inspired writings without expecting to excite a smile among the intelligent. All the ministers ought to be interested in bringing these facts before the people; but they are not "built that way."

There seems to be preponderating evidence that the gospels were written long after the events had occurred which they narrate, and then the narration thrown back a century or two, because by this means the interests of the church could best be subserved. Such a course would giv the church an advantage of a hundred years or two.

For instance, during the life of Christ nobody thought of him as a supernatural being. Long afterward, when the church had gained power and a hierarchy was to be built up, Christ was made the central figure, and, of course, must be clothed with divine power. This could be done a thousand times better two hundred years after his death than it could during his life. All the miraculous part of his life was worked out years and years after he was quietly sleeping in his grave.

This is the belief of most men who hav given the subject close attention. Bishop Marsh says in regard to the book of Matthew: "If the arguments in favor of a late date be compared to those of an early date, it will be found that the former greatly outweigh the latter."

The average Christian believes that in the time of Christ there were a few followers under the direct control of God who wrote the New Testament, and that no other scriptures were written. The truth is, the New Testament was written long after the life of Christ, and is but a small part of what was written.

Even a partial list of the so-called sacred writings would act as an eye-opener to most Christians. There were nearly as many "Acts" as there are books in the New Testament. There were the "Acts" of the Apostles, written by Lucius, the "Acts" of the Holy Apostles, the "Acts" of Peter and Paul, "The Acts of Peter and Andrew," "The Acts of Philip," "The Acts of Paul and Thecla," and other "Acts" too numerous to mention. Out of all these "Acts" we hav only "The Acts of the Apostles" in the New Testament.

Now, my Christian friends, I want you to tell me why "The Acts of the Apostles" was selected from all the other "Acts," and why this particular selection was made—when and where it was made. By answering these questions for yourselvs, not for me, you will see what a solid foundation your faith rests upon. Besides, in matters involving the happiness or misery of the whole human family, you ought to be able to giv all the facts. You ought to be able to show that it was a right selection.

If all these "Acts" were genuin, were you not entitled to them? If all were spurious but one, how do you know that you hav got the right one? My dear Christian friend, hug this consoling fact to your breast. There is not one chance in fifty that God ever ordered a book of "Acts" to be written, but, allowing that he did, there is not one chance in fifty that you hav got the right one. Besides the books of "Acts" which I hav mentioned, it is known that some thirty other books of acts were in existence.

In order to giv the Christian a clearer understanding of the furor for sacred writings in an early day, I will mention a few only of the many gospels which were written and held in veneration by the churches, not one of which has been admitted into the New Testament:

Then there is a long list of the "apocalypses"—apocalypse of John, another of Esdras, another of Paul, of Moses, Cerinthus, Peter, Bartholomew, etc.

These are only a few, comparativly, of the specimens of holy bricks which were once considered fit for the temple of the Christian religion. For a more full and complete list of the gospels, acts, apocalypses, oracles, epistles, and books, first and last regarded as sacred by the church, consult Taylor's "Syntagma."

What would the Christian do if he should find out that some of these spurious epistles or gospels or acts or apocalypses had by some oversight crept into his New Testament? They were once believed to be sacred writings. They were voted upon and disputed over and fought about for six hundred years—in fact, the fight is not over yet.

Now, my dear candidates for heaven, you ought to be able to giv the evidence that the inspired writings were voted in, and the spurious voted out.

If men found an object in producing all these spurious writings—and remember that India, China, Japan, Thibet, Arabia, Scandinavia and Persia have all had their portion of sacred writings, which the Christian considers spurious—is it not barely possible that some interested parties might hav written the few books of the New Testament without any help from God at all. O my Christian friend, I would hav you think of these things, and every time you hug the Bible to your breast and call it the "Word of God," remember me.

Every doctrin of the New Testament has been affirmed by some, and denied by others.

It has been the subject of hot disputes and long debates, of bitter quarrels and bloody fights; and, strange to state, has never been settled to this day.

The resurrection was first a spiritual resurrection, and then a bodily resurrection. When the divinity of Christ was first taught, there was a distinction between the father and the son. The son emanated from the father, but was no more the father than a ray of light from the sun was the sun itself. Afterward, the author of John—whoever he might have been—declared that "in the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God." This doctrin was adopted at the great council held in 325, and made obligatory on all Christians.

It was more than a hundred years after the death of Christ before the immaculate conception was hinted at. Polytheism had not yet quite died out, and, according to that system, every great man must bear some strange relation to the gods.

Christ never pretended to be celestially begotten, or to work miracles, nor was such a thing thought of during his life, nor for years after his death; else why are all contemporaneous writers silent upon the subject?

There is no doubt that the Christian religion became quite popular and spread rapidly, and men rarely call others to an account for lying, fraud, and deceit, used in their interest. And when it became the interest of the church to erect Christ into a god, and clothe him with miraculous power, the idea had a small beginning at first, but grew by lying and deceit until it assumed its present proportions.

Oswald says: "The country was so prolific of spurious prophecies, forged epistles and biographies, that it has justly been called the age of pious frauds, and that the stupendous events supposed to hav attended the appearance of the new prophet are not recorded by any contemporary pagan writer." And the testimony of Gibbon is to the same effect.

If the Christian should become acquainted with the history of the different councils in which the various doctrins of the New Testament were discussed and given shape; could he know how these doctrins were urged by some, and opposed by others; could he know how rings were formed and bribes offered before the final vote was taken—he would see more of the work of man, and less of the work of God, in the New Testament, and, like all men who hav given the subject an unbiased investigation, would come to the conclusion that all the different systems of revealed religion rest essentially on the same foundation, and that one system has no preëminence over another, only so far as the intelligence of the age or country in which it originated is concerned.

All that has ever been revealed is found in the book of nature, and this is the book which man should be most desirous to study, and the book which he would most study if he had not been put off the track by a crafty priesthood, and sent after gods and ghosts and spurious revelations.

Original sin, total depravity, eternal punishment, divine inspiration, baptism, the Christian Sabbath, were all matters which were settled by the votes of men in the different councils of the church, and with which God had no more to do than he has with the currency, or the laying of duties on foreign imports.

Christians believe that Christianity originated with Christ. No mistake could be greater. Christ did not preach Christianity as we understand it; he taught the equality and brotherhood of man, and the fatherhood of God, but never claimed to be a god himself. Christ had been dead many years before he was regarded as a god.

A man-god was no new thing in the time of Christ. Xaca, Krishna, Buddha, Plato, Apollonius, Simon Magus, Augustus Cæsar, Pythagoras, and many others, were supposed to be celestially begotten, and a part of them died for the sins of the world. Many great and good men in ancient times were denominated gods. Apollonius said "all good men were entitled to that appellation."

Long before and after the commencement of the Christian era this belief was current, and serves as a clew to the divinity of Christ. The belief in miracles has been common in all past ages. Great men were not only begotten by the gods, but were endowed with power to work miracles. Crucifixions hav been common, and resurrections hav been as necessary and followed as naturally as the tail to a kite.

The doctrin of the atonement was more than a thousand years old when Christ was born. Christians believe that Christ was an offering or sacrifice to appease the wrath of God, that thereby the transgressions of man might be wiped out.

Offerings hav always been made to appease the wrath of offended gods. The more barbarous the people the more inhuman and diabolical the offering. Men, women, and children, bullocks, goats, sheep, doves, and the first-fruits of the land hav been offered up, the brutality of the ceremony diminishing as civilization has advanced. The fact that God could not be appeased until his son was sacrificed shows that he was a peevish, revengeful, and not a magnanimous God.

The doctrin of the trinity is much older than the Christian religion, and is of undoubted Eastern origin. The Hindoo trinity consisted of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. In the Hindoo system the third person is the Holy Breath; in the Christian system it is the Holy Ghost, which means the same thing.

It is known that the ancient Egyptians believed in a Holy Ghost, or Word, or Breath. On an ancient obelisk was found this inscription: 1st. "The Mighty God." 2d. "The Begotten of God." 3d. "The Spirit."

Thus the doctrins of the New Testament, as well as the moral precepts, can be traced to an age antedating the birth of Christ hundreds and, in some instances, thousands of years. Even the spirit, if not the exact language, of the "Golden Rule" was taught by Confucius, Aristotle, and others. Could we go back to the commencement of the Christian era, we would be made to understand what it is quite difficult for Christians to learn at the present day, viz., that it was an age of superstition, when all were influenced by the marvelous more than the natural. Science was trampled in the dust by the hag of superstition. Reason stood no chance in the unequal contest with gods, ghosts, magicians, miracle-workers, and prophets.

One writer says of this period: "The heavens were full of gods. Earth, air, and sea swarmed with angels, spirits, and demons." To show that what I hav said is not overdrawn, I will quote from Irenæus, one of the early fathers, in regard to Marcus. He says: "There is another heretic, Marcus by name; he is a perfect adept in the magical imposture, who has received the highest power from the invisible and ineffable regions above. It appears probable enough that this man possesses a demon, as his familiar spirit, by means of which he seems able to prophesy." Now, I would hav you consider that this is from one of the early fathers of the church. If he was so much under the influence of superstition, what must hav been the condition of the masses? Would it take a wonderful man to foretell future events or work miracles among such people? Is it any wonder that there were inspired men and immaculate conceptions among such a people?

There never were any inspired men. It would be impossible to make the intelligent believe that there are inspired men to-day, but they believe there were inspired men two thousand years ago. There is good reason to believe that nobody regarded the early Christian writers as inspired at the time. Afterward, when the church became strong, these writings were clothed with divine authority and thus made the whip to fleece Christians into obedience to the churches. Athenagoras, who wrote an "Apology for Christians" about the year 177, makes no mention of the inspiration of the New Testament writers, but speaks of what came down to him by tradition. Hegesippus wrote "A Complete History of the Christian Religion" up to the year 185. Yet he makes no mention of the canonical gospels. This ought to be satisfactory evidence that there were neither inspired men nor canonical gospels until near the beginning of the third century.

It should be borne in mind that after the power of the church became supreme it controled not only the writings but the minds of men. Nearly all writings and books distasteful to the church were either altered or destroyed. The church, to hold its power, seemed determined that the people should know nothing but "Christ and him crucified." All writers who did not indorse the Christian scheme had their writings either altered or destroyed. All Christian writers were determined to build up the church by any means, foul or fair, often resorting to lying and deceit. If we could hav access to all the literature of the early days of the church, we should understand better why one-half of the people were interested in making fools of the other half. The truth is, there was not one in a hundred who could write, and those who could were endeavoring to dupe those who could not. The dupes knew nothing of what had been written only as it was told to them by those interested in the plant.

There were no newspapers, and few to criticise. And if there had been, after the days of Constantine the critics would hav fared hard. Hence the inaccuracies, discrepancies, and contradictions of the New Testament.

From the few fragments of history which hav slipped through the fingers of the church and come down to us, and from the writings of the early fathers, we learn that the divinity of Christ, his miracles, the conception, resurrection, and ascension, the time he preached, his age, and many other things hav all been in dispute—affirmed and denied—and can never be settled to the satisfaction of all.

Because certain erring, fallible men like ourselvs, and many of them under bribes or threats, voted so and so in a church council fifteen or eighteen hundred years ago is no evidence of truth or accuracy to the student of history.

The gospels show that the ministry of Christ lasted about three years. Irenæus says it lasted about twenty, and he claims that he had this tradition from the elders in Asia, who had it from John and the other apostles. The New Testament teaches that Christ was a little over thirty years old when he was crucified. Some of the early fathers say he was over fifty, and some say he was not crucified at all. At this distance of time, it would be utterly impossible to find out the exact truth in regard to these matters. Doctor Davidson says of the early fathers: "They had neither the ability nor the inclination to examin documents surrounded with an apostolic halo. All the rhetoric employed to throw the value of their testimony as far back as possible, even up to the apostle John, is of the vaguest kind. Their decisions were much more the result of pious feeling than sound judgment."

Waite says the credulity of the early fathers was unbounded; that they had a sublime disregard for the truth. Their unscrupulousness when seeking for arguments to enforce their position was notorious, as well as the prevalence of what is known as pious fraud. Jones says they made testimonies out of forgeries and spurious books.

Instead of the New Testament resting upon the rock of truth, it rests upon forgeries, frauds, and lies.

And yet we hav in this country seventy thousand men whose business it is to keep the people sufficiently ignorant to be imposed upon by this trinity of deception. And then the Sabbath-schools and other machinery for molding the plastic mind of the young, so that they will swallow down the pious pills prepared by these lying, forging fathers, is immense, and the wickedness incalculable. And still we hav Liberals who, though they are not constant attendants at church, attend church fairs and festivals and in various ways pay their money to help these seventy thousand pious sticklebacks impose upon the people with their frauds and forgeries.

Many of these Liberals think, after all, that there is a sort of moral halo surrounding the church, and it is well enough to hav the wife attend the church and the children attend Sunday-school. Let me say to you that the morality of the church is like the drapery of an abandoned woman, "put on" to make her person attractiv. It is only the glimmer of a stinking fish by moonlight, the halo produced by the rising gases from a putrid carcass. Instead of giving one dollar to perpetuate this delusion, join with me to tear the silken drapery from the old hag of superstition and expose her to public gaze in all her hideous deformity.

Story of an Escaped Nun.

Near the close of the late war a nun escaped from a convent in Canada West. Having been compelled to enter the same by her grandmother, it would not do to go to her again; but having a sister, the wife of a captain in the service of the United States, she set out to reach the city of Washington, where he was stationed. She had not a penny to pay her fare, but no conductor had the hardihood to put the pretty young woman off until she passed beyond Baltimore. The only aid she received between Canada and Baltimore was twenty-five cents from a sympathetic woman. After passing that city the conductor told her she must pay her fare or be put off. This attracted the notice of some soldiers, one of whom happened to know her brother-in-law, the captain. He therefore paid her fare, which enabled her to reach her relativs.

They were thunderstruck, but had to take her in. The grandmother and other relativs in Canada disowned the renegade. Her comeliness attracted suitors. One elderly and wealthy man sought her hand. Another young but dissipated man, the only son of a wealthy gentleman of Rochester, N. Y., was accepted. They were married at the house of the Rev. John C. Smith, late pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian church of Washington, who remarked how superior the bride appeared to the groom.

The husband was in the service connected with the army. In due time twin daughters were born, and not long afterward the husband deserted wife and children. Meanwhile the grandmother in Canada had become so far reconciled to the apostate child as to send her a few presents, among which was a gold watch. This the husband took away with him and never returned it. In fact, he robbed his wife and left her destitute with two infants.

Thrown entirely on her own resources and renounced by her relativs on both sides, she was reduced to extreme want. At this time my wife and I first became acquainted with her. She was begging for work. Taking an interest in her case, we contributed pretty freely to her wants, and helped to provide a home for her in a shanty on a leased lot.

She was very industrious, and willing to do the hardest kind of work. She got employment at hotels to scrub floors, and at last, being the wife of a former employee in the army, she got some menial work in the treasury building with pretty liberal pay.

But I was not satisfied to see her thus degraded, and communicated her condition to her husband's father in Rochester, through a Baptist clergyman there. The answer I received was substantially this: The son is a worthless vagabond, discarded by the father and family. They do not recognize him or his marriage, and nothing is to be expected from them.

As there seemed to be a doubt thrown upon the fact of the marriage, my wife called upon the clergyman who performed the ceremony, and he remembered all the circumstances quite clearly. The certificate of marriage we also saw, but afterward the woman, in a fit of indignation, foolishly tore it up.

So there was no help to be afforded, not the smallest pittance from the husband's wealthy father, and it was impracticable to attempt to obtain any favor from the woman's rich relativs in Canada.

But time soon brought a little temporary relief. The father, at last, did appear to relent, and to recognize the daughter-in-law so long as his dissipated son would liv with her. The husband came back to Washington and for awhile held an office. But he soon lost it and again deserted his wife and children.

Again the wife and children were reduced to want. By and by one of the twins died. The husband meanwhile had gone to a western state and settled on a farm provided for him by his father. Then he wanted his wife to come to him. She refused. He threatened to come and take the child. She came and asked us what she should do. Hold on to your child by all means, said we. But by and by we heard that he had indeed come and taken wife and child with him.

Many years hav now passed and we hav heard nothing of them. The woman was very intelligent. She repudiated the Catholic religion, but was very uncommunicativ about the secrets of convent life, apparently in fear of personal injury should she disclose what she knew. Her husband's family were Protestants.

Her maiden name was Catharine Macdonald, and she claimed Sir John Macdonald as a cousin. Her husband's name was Mudgett.

The tender mercies of the pious are cruel. I hav been young and now am old, yet hav I often seen the righteous forsaken and his seed begging bread.

Washington, D. C., June 28, 1886. W. H. B.

P.S.—At the very time when we first made the acquaintance of this woman, there lived next door to us a devout Catholic maiden, who, during that year, spent three months in a local convent. And on the 13th of February, 1872, the Daily Chronicle contained the following letter:

ESCAPED NUNS.

Whatever may be said of Edith O'Gormon, permit me to state that to my personal knowledge there are now living in this city two escaped nuns. One came out of an institution in this city recently after a short trial. The other escaped from a nunnery in Canada several years ago. The former still adheres to the Catholic faith. The latter renounces it. Both seal their lips and refuse to disclose what they know. Furthermore, I am assured that not many years ago an inmate of the convent at Georgetown escaped from that institution in her night-clothes. The restraint of a female against her will ought not to be allowed in any country, much less in one where the people are sovereign. Humanity demands that a commission should be empowered to enter the doors of all such institutions and offer liberty to those who desire it.

FIAT JUSTITIA.

Poor Mrs. Mudgett either read this paragraph or heard of it, for she came to our house in alarm, suspecting that I wrote it. And one New York paper (the Sun, if I remember right) deplored the movement in Washington to open the convents. B.

Prohibition.

Quite a number of writers in THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal paper hav had something to say about my Anti-Prohibition, but none of them attempt seriously the task of refuting my arguments. My critics only mince around the edges of the question of Prohibition or content themselvs with discussing side issues. They beat all around the bush, but do not come to the front and face the music. It is to no purpose to argue the question of temperance with me, because I am a temperance advocate myself. The issue is not temperance, but Prohibition.

Our good Liberal friend, Mr. A. T. McMillan, of Wamego, Kansas, refers to me and my attitude on this subject in THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 31st, in these words: "I am a little disappointed to see that Professor Bell is opposing Prohibition. I think he is making a mistake. Prohibition has come to stay, and is reasonably successful in Kansas, except in the large cities. It is perfectly consistent with Liberalism, and is championed by many of the best Liberals. We need Professor Bell, with his masterly logic and polished oratory, in the Liberal field."

Let me say briefly, in reply to these several statements, that I am now and hav been for eleven years in the activ service of Freethought, and hav not the remotest idea of going upon the retired list until I am mustered out. I think I hav presented the subject of prohibition in a rational way and in a light which shows that it is not "consistent with Liberalism;" and besides, I am quite positiv that Prohibition is not "championed by many of the best Liberals"—I mean the best thinkers—and it would prove nothing even if there were men and women of intellectual ability advocating it. As a question of fact, it is not true that there are any of the best Liberals (best thinkers) championing Prohibition. If there were we should see what they can do "plainly writ" in THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers. It proves nothing to say that "Prohibition has come to stay," for the church has come to stay, and has been staying entirely too long. Political parties hav come to stay; national banks hav come to stay, but what Liberal can defend churches, political parties, or national banks?

The thing for Brother McMillan or any of his Prohibition friends to do is to refute my arguments and "masterly logic," or confess they cannot do it, and become consistent Liberals. W. S. BELL.

What Sir Isaac Newton Said About God.

Probably most of us who are Atheists approached that position slowly against strong prejudice. We were first surprised to find that we knew absolutely nothing about God; that even the intelligent part of church people entertained no practical belief in any superintending providence; that God did all his direct interfering with mundane affairs ages ago and had it recorded in a book, and that those who really think now that God reveals anything to them are enthusiasts or cranks. The Interior designates the belief of those who hav faith in God's present ability to cure physical disease as "the faith-cure humbug."

The motto of Cromwell, "Trust in God, but keep your powder dry," is practical Atheism. If trust in God will not explode wet powder, or, at least, that which is a little damp, it amounts to nothing. Dry powder is sure to explode when ignited, not only without trust in God, but in spite of all gods. Even the advocate of faith tells us that it is unreasonable to call on God to do for us what we can do ourselvs. Hence the motto, "God helps those who help themselvs." Evidently that kind of help is superfluous. It is simply idiotic or hypocritical to ask God to "giv us this day our daily bread" when we hav already provided ourselvs in advance with several months' provisions in the ordinary secular way. Those who cannot help themselvs call on God in vain. They find that "he has gone on a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth." The strong, who are able, in the hoggish struggle for gain, which some call business, to root out the feeble hogs (pigs) and get all the swill, can pray indifferently to God, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, or the devil. They are sure of God's help. They constitute "the powers that be," and "the powers that be are ordained of God;" or, more strictly, the powers that be ordain the God, and hence, "he that resisteth the power resisteth God." And the creators and ordainers of this God hav so arranged that "unto everyone that hath shall be given, and he shall hav abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken away that which he hath."

We know, then, to a certainty, that the god problem has no practical interest for poor folks, only that they may know who are the makers of the god. That a god should make the world is absurd, because that is producing something out of nothing—the real out of the imaginary; but that a real man should construct a god out of his imagination is not only possible, but is what we know millions of people hav done. The gods are all made that way.

To some people it seems presumptuous to ignore on this subject the authority of great men; but often these great men, in treating this subject, make such a weak case as to overwhelm the earnest inquirer with doubt. If great men—men of profound knowledge and vigorous minds—hav left this subject in a crude, unsatisfactory, muddled condition, it must be because there is nothing in it within reach of the human mind.

Darwin, after writing his great work on "The Origin of Species," without making any reference to a creator, concludes by observing that "there is grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed by the Creator into a few forms or into one."

In the first place, Mr. Darwin made it perfectly clear that if there were original forms they must hav been very rudimentary, simple, and minute. For millions of ages animals inhabited the earth before any were developed with lungs into which anything could be breathed; and where does the grandeur come in in imagining a God without lungs breathing life into an organism without lungs, into a microscopic monad, a mere organized stomach, or a drop of animated jelly? If an animal existed which was already alive, it needed no creator to breathe life into it. If it was not alive, it must hav grown while it was dead. Evolution points to no creator or first cause. It operates in the universe by the interaction of forces within the universe, and, as Holyoake says, "the universe seems to be an infinit series of causes and effects, and therefore a first cause is an absurdity and a contradiction."

Newton, like Darwin, wrote his "Principia" without saying anything about God until he came to the last Scholium, in which he givs an elaborate description of him. He starts in by suggesting that "lest the fixed stars should, by their gravity, fall on each other, God hath placed those systems at immense distances one from another." God must hav made them close together or he would not hav had to separate them. Laplace assumed that systems were so far apart because each system had drawn into its embrace everything within range of its attraction. Hav we any evidence that God could make Niagara river run back over the precipice at the Falls? What an assumption to imagin a God, and then imagin that he could take two solar systems and place them 20,000,000,000 miles apart, or millions of solar systems and scatter them through infinit space!

After spending many years in the production of a work which upset the prevailing and almost unanimous opinions of mankind, Newton's only argument for the existence of God was that everybody believed it. He says, "It is allowed by all that the Supreme God exists necessarily, and by the same necessity he exists always and everywhere." In that regard he is as helpless as we are. He has no choice in the matter. He exists because he cannot help it. If he is good, it is no credit to him. If he is bad, it is his misfortune. If he cannot be different from what he is, he cannot do differently from what he does.

But Newton, having imagined a God, lest he should be too much of an entity, proceeds to get him out of the way. "In him are all things contained and moved, yet neither affects the other. God suffers nothing from the motion of bodies; bodies find no resistance from the omnipresence of God." Gravity is what does the business. All God has to do is to keep out of the way.

"He is all similar; all eye, all ear, all brain, all arm, all power to perceive, to understand, and to act; but in a manner not at all human, in a manner not at all corporeal, in a manner utterly unknown to us. As a blind man has no idea of colors, so hav we no idea of the manner by which the all-wise God perceives and understands all things. He is utterly void of all body and bodily figure, and can therefore neither be seen nor heard nor touched." That is all very clear. He is all eye, but has no eyes, and sees all things and numbers hairs and watches sparrows. He is all ear, but has no ears, and hears everything and takes account of every idle word that ever was or will be uttered. He is all brain, but has no brains, and so thinks and understands all things in a manner utterly unknown, unknowable, and unthinkable. He is all arm, but never touches anything, and cannot be touched. He is all power to act, but has to keep out of the way so water can run down-hill and the planets move freely in their orbits.

"Lastly, all that diversity of natural things which we find suited to different times and places could arise from nothing but the ideas and will of a being necessarily existing. But by way of allegory God is said to see, to speak, to laugh, to love, to hate, to desire, to giv, to receive, to rejoice, to be angry, to fight, to frame, to build; for all our ideas of God are taken from the ways of mankind."

Certainly the notion of a God, involving in his composition nothing but what is taken from the ways of mankind, and who does nothing that can be expressed in human speech otherwise than by allegory and fable, could arise from nothing but the imagination of mankind, of which it is a phantasmal shadow. By way of allegory, Santa Claus is said to drive reindeer through the air and scatter Waterbury watches all over Europe and America. When God is said to speak, it is implied that some foolish thing has been said or written by some prophet or pope, priest or preacher. When God laughs, something has occurred to tickle the preacher. Lucky that God was only figurativly angry when he slew the Midianites, Canaanites, Amalekites, and Philistines, sparing neither old men nor maidens, infants nor sucklings, because if he had been truly angry he might hav done something desperate.

This detailed description of a God about whom we are informed we can hav no more idea than a blind man has of colors, is Newton's scientific demonstration of the existence of God about which so much has been said and of which Newton says, "To discourse of whom from the appearances of things does certainly belong to natural philosophy."

In spite of all attempts to "rise from nature up to nature's God," it is admitted by many of the most thoughtful among the clergy that science does not prove the existence of God. The late Rev. J. M. Manning, pastor of Old South Church, Boston, and lecturer on the relations of Christianity to popular Infidelity in Andover Theological Seminary, says that all really logical minds that reject the Bible and Christ inevitably drift into either Positivism or Pantheism. Rev. Mr. Little, when he was Presbyterian synodical missionary for the state of Nebraska, delivered a discourse in Beaver City in which he said: "The skeptic says to me, Demonstrate the truth of the Bible and I will believe it. That is an unreasonable demand. It never has been done, and never can be done. Even the central idea of all religion—the existence of God—has never been proved. We apprehend this great truth by faith."

If "the fool hath said in his heart there is no God," many wise men hav observed that it is not worth while to make assertions about what we can know absolutely nothing of. To quote from G. J. Holyoake, "The existence of God is a problem to which the mathematics of human intelligence seems to me to furnish no solution. The world possesses as yet no adequate logic for that province of speculation. It is a problem without a solution, a hieroglyphic without an interpretation, a Gordian Knot still untied, a question unanswered, a thread still unraveled, a labyrinth untrod." God must still be represented by x, but what the other term of the equation is no one knoweth or can know. Most likely $x=0$. D. PRIESTLEY.

Atheism and Citizenship.

Carl Rabitscheck, an intelligent, prosperous-looking Bohemian, went to the naturalization bureau of this city on the 3d to declare his intention of becoming a citizen. He was handed a Bible to swear by, but declined to take the oath, as he was an Atheist. Clerk Jarvis thereupon refused to receive his declaration, and was sustained by other officers of the court. The naturalization bureau will hang out a sign, "No Atheists need apply here."

Between Colonel Ingersoll and a reporter the following conversation touching this question occurred. The reporter asked: "Hav you noticed the decision of Mr. Nathaniel Jarvis, Jr., clerk of the naturalization bureau of the Court of Common Pleas, that an Atheist cannot become a citizen?"

"Yes, sir," replied Colonel Ingersoll, but I do not think it necessary for a man to be a Theist in order to become or to remain a citizen of this country. The various laws, from 1790 up to 1828, provided that the person wishing to be naturalized might make oath or affirmation. The first exception you will find in the Revised Statutes of the United States passed in the winter of 1873–4, section 2,165, as follows: 'An alien may be admitted to become a citizen of the United states in the following manner, and not otherwise: First he shall declare on oath, before a circuit or district court of the United States,' etc. I suppose Mr. Jarvis felt it to be his duty to comply with this section. In this section there is nothing about affirmation—only the word 'oath' is used—and Mr. Jarvis came to the conclusion that an Atheist could not take an oath, and therefore could not declare his intentions legally to become a citizen of the United States. Undoubtedly, Mr. Jarvis felt it his duty to stand by the law and to see to it that nobody should become a citizen of this country who had not a well-defined belief in the existence of a being that he could not define and that no man has ever been able to define. In other words, that he should be perfectly convinced that there is a being 'without body, parts, or passions,' who presides over the destinies of this world, and more especially those of New York in and about that part known as City Hall Park."

"Was not Mr. Jarvis right in standing by the law?"

"If Mr. Jarvis is right, neither Humboldt nor Darwin could hav become a citizen of the United States. Wagner, the greatest of musicians, not being able to take an oath, would hav been left an alien. Under this ruling Haeckel, Spencer, and Tyndall would be denied citizenship—that is to say, the six greatest men produced by the human race in the nineteenth century, were and are unfit to be citizens of the United States. Those who hav placed the human race in debt cannot be citizens of this republic. On the other hand, the ignorant wife beater, the criminal, the pauper raised in the workhouse, could take the necessary oath and would be welcomed by New York 'with arms outstretched as she would fly.'"

"You hav quoted one statute. Is there no other applicable to this case?"

"I am coming to that. If Mr. Jarvis will take the pains to read not only the law of naturalization in section 2,165 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, but the very first chapter in the book, 'Title I.,' he will find in the very first section this sentence: 'The requirement of an "oath" shall be deemed complied with by making affirmation in official form.' This applies to section 2,165. Of course an Atheist can affirm, and the statute provides that wherever an oath is required affirmation may be made."

"Did you read," further asked the reporter, "the recent action of Judge O'Gorman, of the Superior Court, in refusing naturalization papers to an applicant because he had not read the Constitution of the United States?"

"I did," was the response, and then the colonel added: "The United States Constitution is a very important document, a good, sound document, but it is talked about a great deal more than it is read. I'll venture that you may commence at the Battery to interview merchants and other business men about the Constitution and you will talk with a hundred before you will find one who has ever read it."

The Spirit Photography Investigation.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Press of business prevents me from immediately replying to the report of the Spirit Photography Committee.

I trust your readers will suspend judgment until after my criticism has appeared, and I promis to take no longer time in its preparation than did the committee in presenting the report. R. M. ROBINSON.

Greenpoint, L. I., Aug. 8, 1886.

Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association.

It has been decided to hold the Annual Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association at White Sulphur Springs Park, Saratoga county, N. Y., commencing Thursday, September 2d, continuing over two Sundays, and adjourning on Sunday night, September 12th.

A more beautiful and desirable place to hold our Convention does not exist in the state. It is proposed to make this Convention preëminently sociable, and more of the nature of a picnic than a formal convention. One, and perhaps the main, object is the devising and discussing more efficient and practical methods of advancing the cause of Liberalism, and inciting honest, intelligent persons to study and embrace the ennobling principles of Secularism.

To effect this the first essential is, not alone that the thinkers and workers meet each other, but that all the Liberals of our state and vicinity should meet together and become personally acquainted, and thus be induced to take greater and more kindly interest in each other's welfare. To this end it is decided that the meeting shall afford every possible facility for sociability.

There will be no regular lectures in the morning, except on Sundays. The day, up to 3 P.M., will be devoted to recreation and amusement, and for this there are bathing, boating, fishing, croquet, swinging; rambling through the beautiful groves, over the romantic hills, and among picturesque dales; resting in the hammocks beneath the shade of the lofty trees, or reclining on the bright green grass, basking in the sunshine, fanned by the gentle breezes from the beautiful lake; making excursions over the lake to its many interesting points, and riding to Saratoga on top of the "tally-ho" coaches, after "ye fashion of ye olden time;" visiting the wonderful mineral springs, and the largest and most gorgeous hotels in the world; taking advantage of every opportunity to form acquaintances which in many instances will result in life-long friendship; comparing plans and methods of work, and discussing the various projects and suggestions brought before the Convention, so as to be able to vote on them understandingly.

Occasionally those interested can gather in the picnic grounds or in the lecture pavilion and listen to short addresses from Liberals—not regular lecturers—who hav plans to unfold or important and valuable suggestions to make for the advancement of the cause and promotion of the general good.

On three or four afternoons and two or three evenings we will dispense with the lecture or hav only a sharp, pithy, stirring one, not to exceed thirty minutes, and devote the rest of the time to dancing.

There is a magnificent dancing pavilion on the grounds, and the most proficient of callers and the very best of music hav been engaged.

And while every possible provision is made for a jolly, happy picnic, and the promotion of sociability, our best and most able lecturers will be present, and will giv us their best and brightest thoughts, speaking on those subjects only which are of vital import, and respecting which the people are most interested.

Plans and suggestions will be laid before the Convention, and time afforded for consideration and amendment, so that on adjournment all can return home resolved to labor zealously and harmoniously in carrying out plans adopted, and thus insure a mighty impetus to the work.

Board with room, first-class, is only one dollar per day; fare to and from all parts at reduced rates; single admission to lecture, 10 cents. There are preliminary expenses that must be met, but no funds in the treasury. Who will help in the good work? It is essential to the success of the Convention that contributions be sent in at once. Reader, we appeal to you. Are you disposed to help forward and insure success of the Convention? The meeting must be thoroughly advertised; posters and hand-bills printed, carefully posted and distributed in every village within twenty miles of the place of meeting. This cannot be done without cash payments. Success of the Convention means grand progress of the cause during the next year throughout the entire state. Send in your donations as early as possible.

We offer to all who send one dollar forthwith a season ticket, admitting the holder to each and every lecture. Admission will be paid at the door by all who do not hold season tickets.

It will be necessary for all who attend, especially if there are ladies in the party, to make immediate application for rooms to C. B. Reynolds, care of the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York. There is a limit to the capacity of the house, and the rule will be, First come, first served. When ordering rooms, please inclose $1 for each person, for season tickets.

Let all send in $1 for season ticket. If you cannot go, you can the better afford to send your contribution to the expenses. The success of the Convention is a matter of personal interest to every Liberal in the state. Let all attend who possibly can—all help bear the burden, that all may rejoice in and share the glorious success.

Contributions should be sent by registered letter or post-office order to E. M. Macdonald, treasurer, TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York.

In behalf of the committee, C. B. REYNOLDS.

News and Notes.

I gave a parlor lecture at Salt Lake City on Sunday evening, July 25th, under the auspices of my good friends, Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Mason. I found it quite an agreeable change from the platform discourse. It is more sociable and allows more mutual exchange of thought and direct and personal expression of ideas; besides, those can be gathered together at a parlor lecture who will not always attend a public meeting. Mormons, Episcopalians, Congregationalists, and Methodists, together with Liberals, were present, and the lecture on "The Glory of Infidelity" was good-naturedly received, although, of course, the orthodox part of my audience did not heartily indorse all my sentiments, but I guess they heard something new and hav a better understanding of the spirit of our work. After the lecture there was music and conversation which made the hours pass pleasantly away. All had an opportunity to say their say, and the varied discussion was animated and most cordial.

I hav thoroughly enjoyed a few days' rest at Zion, for it has many attractions both heterodox and orthodox. I went over the Coöperative Mercantile Institute Building with my pleasant Mormon friend, Mr. Clawson, who belongs to a big family of boys and girls—forty-five—his father being one of the dignitaries of the church, and will, no doubt, occupy a lofty throne in the celestial kingdom. The Institute Building is the largest in the city, and is filled with goods of every description to the value of a million dollars. This Institute is a joint stock company, and, of course, the few who own the majority of shares control the business and receive the principal benefit. In most of the settlements outside of Salt Lake City the Z. C. M. I. is almost entirely in the ownership of one man, who runs the affair and makes money to suit himself. While the Z. C. M. I. of Salt Lake City was under the quasi religious management of Brigham Young it was a failure, and the value of the shares went down to less than half. It was then put into the hands of first-rate business men and run on business principles, and is in that way a flourishing affair. It is on a money-making basis, which is all right, but it is by no means a fraternal association. The gentile can get as much benefit from it as the Mormon. It is "root, hog, or die" with the Mormons as with the rest of mankind. They don't help each other any more than the sinners do. There are no poor in Utah simply because there are no poor or paupers in any of the Western territories. Every man can scratch some kind of a living, but the majority of the Mormons hug poverty very close. If Dyer Lum is satisfied with this kind of coöperation, then he is easily satisfied; not with a half loaf, but with about a hundredth part of a half loaf. I had about as soon take my chances in Wall street as among the Mormon saints, even if I were a good Mormon. To be a real good Mormon one must hav a pretty big bank account. As I hav said before, the Mormon religion is a solid affair.

I also visited the Museum, the greatest curiosity of which is the owner himself, who is a red-hot Mormon, an apostle, I believe, and a very intelligent man. While showing me the wonders of the land and sea, etc., he gavé a brilliant discourse on Mormon doctrins, etc., which I would not hav missed on any account. I selected a few hot-shot out of his theological fireworks for the benefit of my friend Lum one of these days. I hav got information from headquarters, and it confirms every opinion that I hav hitherto expressed. My vivacious saint addressed me at first as a "son of Israel," but when I plied him with a few questions he called me a "hound of the law;" all in good spirit though, in Christian meekness, for I myself was in a saintly frame, since I was sitting in the veritable rocking-chair that Joseph Smith used to rock in, and I suppose the invisible prophetic mantle was upon me. At any rate it was a comfortable chair, and I had no objection to whatever inspiration it might giv to my spinal column.

The Mormons hav a very beautiful theology indeed. I rather like it. I find that Adam is practically the God of the Mormon; for, when this planet is perfected, he will be the God and the father of it, subject, however, to the great father of all, the Elohim, who is "the masterpiece of intelligence," under whom a million gods like Adam hold sway. There are a million "perfected worlds" at the present time. Each of these worlds has a god and father of its own. The earth is not quite perfected; Christ has not yet conquered it. When he has, he will giv it to Adam for his eternal glorious domain. Every seven thousand years a world is perfected, and swings up into the round of heaven. Our time is almost at hand. We shall soon soar up into the circle of eternity. According to Orson Pratt, the biggest God of all, the Elohim, is only about six feet high. One must admit that he is almighty smart for his size. I hav collected many other curiosities of the Mormon faith, but time will not permit a further exhibit.

I also took a Salt Lake bath, which is one of the most delightful baths in the world. You can float for hours on the glorious waters, almost like a cork, and can't drown unless you make a special effort to do so. But beware of swallowing a bit of the briny deep. If you do, you might as well drown, for the salt water cuts the throat and lungs like a knife.

Everybody is busy now with the harvest, and so the Utah Liberal campaign is over for the present. I spent Wednesday evening, the 28th, with friend Reynolds, at Wanship, and when the breezy autumn comes the campaign will be renewed, and we look forward with bright hopes to the Convention of February next. There will be a summoning of all the clans, and forward march.

On Thursday and Friday evenings, the 29th and 30th, I lectured at Rock Springs to good houses. At any rate, I had more than the ministers, or even a prize-fight, and to beat a prize-fight is something quite remarkable in a Western town.

Rock Springs is a good place for our lecturers to stop at when traveling over the Union Pacific railroad. Let them communicate with T. B. Meredith, and they will receive a warm welcome.

On Friday afternoon my friend Meredith took me into the vast under-world of the coal mines, which extend for several miles, and where hundreds of men are at work. The coal here is of superior quality, and thousands of tons are daily shipped. It was quite interesting to wander through Pluto's empire, with its dark and frowning wealth, soon to dance in fairy flames on a thousand hearthstones, and make more brilliant the civilization of man. The flickering lamps on the foreheads of the men, the grimy faces, the rolling thunder of exploding rock and falling crash, the sound of pick, the rattle of chain and car, and tramp of horse and thump of engin, and the all-encircling darkness, made one think he was in the magical domain of the genii, who were working out some wondrous drama, transforming the bowels of earth into flames of glory.

On Saturday afternoon, under the guidance of my friend Williams, who is called "Bishop," and therefore, of course, a safe conductor, I passed through the Chinese quarters, and saw the home of these curious people. About a dozen liv together in one shanty. Some are cooking, some are smoking opium or tobacco, and some are dead asleep under the influence of the drug, and some are gambling. Some welcome with a pleasant face, some look with a scornful glance, and some greet you with cold suspicion. There are all sorts of Chinamen, as of other folks. I met the chief "boss," Mr. Coon, who is a very intelligent gentleman, and givs you a pleasant impression of what the cultivated Chinese might be.

From Rock Springs I came on to Greeley, Col., where I lectured yesterday, Sunday, August 1st. This is the garden of Colorado, and, as I look upon the well-cultivated fields, I seem to be in one of the beautiful villages of Massachusetts. I had a hall full yesterday at the lecture, and I find a goodly number of Liberal friends here. I lecture here again this evening, and shall hav more to say of the friends and the work at Greeley in my next letter.

From here I go to Longmont, where I shall spend a few days with Col. John R. Kelso, who is known as one of our ablest workers.

After my lectures in Colorado, I shall be at Seward, Neb., August 21st, 22d, 23d; at Valley Falls, Kan., August 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th. It is possible the appointment at Lincoln, Neb., may be changed. I shall be at West Point, Neb., September 1st, 2d, and 3d, and at Omaha September 5th, etc., as already published. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Greeley, Col., Aug. 2, 1886.

W. F. JAMIESON, having received lecture and debate calls in Wisconsin and Michigan, returned East a distance of six hundred miles, and will defer his Montana trip a few weeks longer. He is now lecturing in Neilsville, Wis. In the mean time he invites Liberals along the route to address him at Lake City, Minn., and he will arrange to deliver lectures on the way. Michigan Liberals who may desire Freethought lectures in their towns will please address him at once.

With Regard to Angels.

CONCERNING THE ENTREE INTO HEAVEN OF THE ASSUMED-TO-BE IMMORTAL MAN.

Taking the ground of those who assume that his body will be rehabilitated, the writer is led to wonder whether or not it will be the body as it went into the grave, regardless of age, decrepitude, or malformation, if such existed, naturally or otherwise.

For instance, will a man of ninety or a hundred, say, bent and twisted with rheumatism, and sightless at the time of his death, take this body with him into heaven, provided he passes the doorkeeper as one of the right sort? Would a man wish to? Wouldn't he rather hav remained in the state of nothingness?

Are the lame and the blind, the one-eyed and the humpbacked, to take on these shapes and appearances? Will there be blind and humpbacked angels, one-eyed and one-legged angels in heaven? And what about infants, and five-year-olds, and so on? Will there be infant and five-year-old angels in heaven as well as aged angels? Yes, the writer is led to wonder, in regard to angelic personality, as relating to angels imported from earth; and who, outside the pale of the "true believers," wouldn't wonder?

The true-blue Scotch Presbyterian tells us that hell is paved with infants' skulls, which precludes the idea of infant angels; but the vaporic Talmage, not so awful and exclusiv, tells us that all the angels will ride on white horses in heaven; and his ipse dixit, while it also precludes the idea of infantil angels, seems to argue that infants will be brought up to the adult or regulation size, on making their debut in heaven. But, after all, what does he know about it? or the true-blue Scotch Presbyterian?

The mystery, or what will be the mystery, of the "resurrection" must be a puzzler to the "true believer" even, if he ever buckles right down to a serious contemplation of the subject. If he believes that a malformed mortal will take on the human form divine, which means, of course, a perfect form, what does he believe with regard to the ill-shapen form? Is this form to be left in the mud when the graves giv up their dead at the "last trump," or is it to come forth in all the pristine beauty of the first-made man, regardless of its shape ere mortal death? The latter, I suppose, is what the religionist believes, or thinks he believes, which with him amounts to the same thing as belief.

Now, if the misshapen ones of earth are to be got up in good form at the "last day," how about the homely of face? Are they to be made handsome, as befitting their occupation of angels amid the glories of heaven? If so, won't it lead to confusion worse confounded in the first instance, and to heart-burnings in the other? Would the hunchback know himself in perfect form? Would the one-eyed man know himself with two good ogles and a much handsomer face than he ever could boast in life? Wouldn't some, all of the new-fledged female angels, preëminent among the sex on earth for their beauty, be wofully cut up to find all their sister angels on a par with them in the matter of female loveliness? What, then, becomes of their vainglory and proud consciousness of superior beauty? Think you it would be sufficient with them that they were beautiful were all others, particularly those whom they knew to be too homely for anything on earth, beautiful likewise? No, you cannot think so if you know aught of female human nature as it runs, or, for that matter, male human nature.

But human nature will not obtain with angels, religionists will cry. Well, allowing that angelic nature takes the place of human nature, won't it hav its variations? Most assuredly, I think, if there are to be any female angels, for said angels never could settle down to the insipidity of monotonous goodness and beauty, not to mention the universal white raiment which Talmage, who seems to be more thoroughly posted in regard to the internal economy of heaven than any other gospel sharp extant, says will be in vogue in the halls of everlasting bliss; neither could the male angels.

Can any one conceive of a host of feminin angels, if indeed, there is to be such a thing as sex in Elysium, living together in a state of everlasting content, no one having anything to boast of beyond another in the way of superior beauty, attainments, or raiment? It goes without saying that they could not if there were gradations in beauty and attainments, and in the quality of attire, as envy, jealousy, and backbiting would be sure to get in their work; but could they be content in a state of equality? Why, certainly, says the religionist, for they will be molded to conform to such a state. Well, if that is to be the case, what better will they be than so many dummies, puppets, slaves of a superior will? What better than angels of putty endowed with motion? Not any, it strikes me; and yet the religionist must be right, I think, for if they are not to be mere puppets or angels of putty, there will be no peace in heaven. How could there be were each angel to hav a mind of his or her own? There was trouble once in heaven—vide Milton's "Paradise Lost," a true and authentic account of the unfortunate affair from beginning to end—and there would be again if the angels translated from earth were to hav minds of their own, and no two exactly alike. Many men, many minds—meaning many differences of opinion; and why wouldn't it be so with angels of the mankind variety or antecedents?

I think I must agree with the resurrectionist—religionist I meant to hav said—but after all, why not resurrectionist if he believes in the "resurrection" as biblically understood?—that the angels will hav to be regulated to conform to the existing order of things that must perforce obtain in heaven, if everything there is to be lovely, with the goose of homogeneousness of soul altivolant, as it were. Yes, the angels, if peace is to prevail in heaven, must be a confluxible confraternity of hearts that beat as one, a solidarity of souls with but a single thought and purpose. There can be no individualities among them. All will be as near alike as so many drops of water from the same fountain. One will be a fair sample of the entire aggregation—must be, as it appears to me. And what a monotonous conventicle of prescribed goodness will they present? How one would yearn for a little naughtiness—it seems so from a mortal standpoint—just a little to break this solidarity of insipid goodness, eh? But, alas! there won't be anything naughty there, though it were never so nice, for the rule of heavenly goodness cannot be departed from. Let those who want to be angels and with the angels dwell, but yet are a little inclined to the "naughty but nice," bear this in mind.

There is one thing which I hav ever noticed, and that is that pronounced religionists are, as a rule, the homeliest of earth's mortals; and the more ill-favored the more crabbed and zealous they are, and consequently, I suppose, the more impregnated with true religion. One rarely ever sees a beautiful female devotee of the true ascetic type, or a fine-looking masculin devoted to the cause of religion—that is, among the laity. There are many good-looking parsons, I will admit; but religion is a business with them; they preach for pay, and are not to be counted in. Very likely, in their cases, the good looks of many decided their choice of callings, they taking up with the ministry because of the fine field of female conquest it offered, which would not hav been theirs as carpenters, bricklayers, etc. A perusal of the daily papers for a month will show how well they cultivate and succeed in this field.

It is a sure thing, in the writer's opinion, that all who choose the ministerial calling do so because it is the most easily worked of all the professions. Compare it with those of the law, medicin, chemistry, mathematics, etc., etc., and the "soft snap" is apparent at once; and as surely as this is the case, as the writer believes, as surely do the good-looking—the strikingly so—adopt the profession, because of the chances it offers for the exercise of their "mashing" qualities, the ugly ones even having a better show in the field of conquest than they would in any other calling, the average feminin heart surrendering with less resistance to the blandishments of the persuasiv pulpiteer than to those of men in other walks in life. The writer so judges from the daily bulletins from the field, announcing the conquests of the victorious parsons.

This is digression, however; but with what is before presented, the writer must end his useless query in regard to what will be the angelic condition of "just men (women, too) made perfect" immediately after the "day of resurrection," as none can throw any light on the subject. If that "day" ever comes off, we shall all be there to see; and what a startling dress-parade will be presented! SI SLOKUM.

"The Order of Anarchy."

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 31st ult. there is an article under the above title, by J. Wm Lloyd.

Skin-deep, it is in theory of a somewhat specious general character. But I feel sure that whenever any community of the wisest and best one hundred men that J. Wm. Lloyd could select from what is popularly called Christendom, should undertake to realize as much as six per cent on it, they would find it what the late Gov. William Allen of Ohio said the Republican idea of specie resumption would prove—i. e., "A dam flat failure."

It seems to me self-evident that the only community in which such a theory could be materialized would be a community of individuals of perfect wisdom. And even in such a community J. Wm. Lloyd's ideal would hav several superfluities in its details. In such a community there would be no occasion for agreement to the "two things." For mutual respect would be a necessary consequence of the mental development, and there could be no "disputes to refer." Furthermore, it would be impossible for the "groups" to elect their "wisest and justest men" to be their council, etc., for there could be no wisest or justest. In short, such a community, no matter how large or how small, individually and collectivly would always think, speak, and act just exactly right; so that perfect welfare, perfect harmony—in fine, perfect satisfaction—would always prevail. But it is highly probable that several administrations will come and go in these United States before there will be found a single individual qualified to even form a nucleus for such a community of wisdom and virtue as I hav here supposed. And it is not best to wait for such a community, for, as I hav shown, J. Wm. Lloyd's specifications would not fit, but would be entirely superfluous for them. Let J. Wm. Lloyd, or anybody else, take these men as they are, and attempt to realize even on one point—and the easiest point of his code—i. e., to select its "wisest and justest men by unanimous consent!" I think J. Wm. Lloyd will better appreciate the difficulty of such a selection if he will get ten or a dozen of his friends to write the names of three or four persons in his neighborhood whom they regard as "the wisest and justest," and see how they will agree and disagree.

I once heard of a caucus meeting where the wisest and justest men present were elected chairman and secretary—but they were the only persons present; and even then the secretary was mad because he was not made chairman!

But to skip back a little and catch on to a point near the beginning of "The Order of Anarchy." It is there recorded that "Anarchists are men who reject all political headship or rulership, all government of man by man as such; all authority outside of the natural laws of harmony. They hold that every sane, non-criminal individual of right is, or should be, free from all dictation or domination by other individuals . . . In practice the Anarchists claim this model state of things will be best realized by giving each individual perfect freedom to do what he or she pleases, provided that pursuit of pleasure does not lead to the infringement of the equal freedom of others." And the last sentence is the whole of the meat in a nutshell. And it may be condensed to this: the most perfect liberty consistent with the equal liberty of others. And is not this, is not all of this, just what "we, the people" of the United States, through our democratic or republican (for the words are identical in meaning, though the parties by these respectiv names are somewhat different) form of government are trying to realize? This government is by the people, and for the people, and all its officers are the servants and agents of the people. I am aware that in many places the shoe is entirely too large, while in as many others it pinches. But I think this is necessarily so in consequence of the large size and peculiar and ever-changing condition of the foot. Among our people there is the widest possible range of intellectual, moral, and physical development. Consequently most of our laws and regulations are necessarily more or less compromises, and are entirely satisfactory, or perfectly just, to but few—except when applied to them as members of this particular conglomerate commonwealth. Then, I think they are perfection! Yes, perfection, because the inevitable, necessary result of their antecedents, and consequently best fitted to the existing character and condition of the people. "Whatever is, is right," because it is the necessary product of the law of cause and effect. And the "is" cannot be changed without changing the cause. True, by agitation J. Wm. Lloyd may change it. But he never can divide the people of this country up into "groups" that will "elect their wisest and justest men to office by unanimous consent," for

> 'Tis with our judgments as our watches; none
> Are just alike, yet each believes his own.

I think the remedy for all the evils that exist under our form of government, and the only remedy, must be worked out through the improvement of the mental and physical condition of the people. As they now are, one might as well expect to make wholesome and palatable sausage by stuffing good meat into uncleaned and unemptied entrails, as to institute a form of government, or pass and administer a code of laws, that would make all classes prosperous and happy. Now, the wiser, wealthier, and so-called better classes complain that the ringsters and bummers manage and control the caucuses and elections, and they are too pure to take a hand; and the ringsters, and bummers, and all those that get left, complain that the wise and the rich corrupt and buy the officers, and so hav things their own way. And both sides tell a good deal of truth, and both are equally to blame for the result—the one for selecting corruptible officers, and the other for failing to lend their influence where it might, in a measure at least, hav prevented evil by securing a higher grade of officers.

I heard a story of a middle-aged, rich, and shrewd Republican who, in his younger days, had taken great interest and wielded great influence in politics in behalf of his party, so much that he had frequently secured a Republican legislature in his closely-contested state. After he retired from politics, it was noticed that, though still an outspoken Republican, he seemed to hav his own way with the Democratic legislatures. Being asked why he did not work for his party as of old, he replied, "My experience has taught me that it is a d——d sight easier, cheaper, and safer to buy a Democratic legislature in this state than it is to elect a Republican one, especially as even they frequently hav to be bought after they are elected."

And how are the people to be so improved that the evils complained of will cease? Ask any intelligent, successful breeder of cattle who does not now fail once in a hundred times to breed a well and evenly conditioned steer or pig. And things, under the law of the survival of the fittest, are working at both ends to force attention to this matter—at the foot, in the suffering of the ill-formed and ill-favored; and at the head, in the multiform dangers threatened them by these ill-formed and ill-favored; so that, in very self-defense, the favored class are obliged to giv the ill-favored some care and attention. This matter will be attended to more and more as wisdom prevails. I might go into details, but I am conscious that my article is already too long. CYRUS SEARS.

Theological Jugglery.

The God of the Bible was an adept at jugglery. He began business by the most wonderful piece of legerdemain ever heard of in the history of the world, for he created the universe either out of himself or out of nothing. What is nothing? It is merely the absence of something, and most people will be ready to admit that that is a rather poor substance out of which to create and fling into space a world, and the innumerable stars and planets that stud the universe.

But for Jahveh, or Elohim, the God or Gods of the Bible, to create the universe of himself, or themselvs, would be equally difficult. To create means to originate substance, but if God always was in existence, and he created the universe out of himself, there would be no origination of substance, but only a prolongation of himself. But as he was everywhere before he began to create, it would be mere jugglery to try and place something somewhere when there was nowhere to place it, everywhere being already filled up.

But Jahveh, having made the world, the suns, and stars out of nothing, found that he had used up all the nothing before he came to make man. He then had to begin again with the old material.

Man he made out of the dust of the earth. Now, dust of itself has no cohesiv properties; it will not stick together unless some liquid is brought to bear upon it. And what is wet dust but mud? Man therefore was conjured into form out of mud. He virtually emerged from the gutter. God could not hav gone much lower than that in the manufacture of man. Woman God made out of one of Adam's spare ribs. How many ribs has woman? Precisely the same number? Therefore when God first juggled Adam into existence, either Adam must hav had thirteen ribs on one side and only twelve on the other, or when one was extracted he must hav gone lop-sided ever after.

The theologians, being naturally intellectual jugglers, can accept which position they like, or, as is more likely, both at once. But not only was Jahveh a juggler, but all his representativs on earth hav been so, too, from Moses downward.

Take Moses. He conjured with his rod, and turned water into blood, killed a number of inoffensiv animals over several times, turned dirt into lice, and performed a number of other barbarous and filthy tricks which no modern conjurer would attempt to perform. He also did a splendid trick when he divided the Red Sea to allow the Israelites to cross in safety when pursued by the Egyptians, and calmly waited until the last small boy had safely landed on the other side before he let the waters return to submerge the poor, ill-used Egyptians. Joshua, too, pretended to do an extraordinary piece of legerdemain in commanding the sun to stand still—though everybody now knows that, so far as this earth is concerned, it does not move.

Then, there was Samson, of long-hair celebrity—was not his conjuring with the jaw-bone of an ass astounding? The learned revisers of the Bible now say that it was merely a metaphorical jaw-bone. What is that? I hav heard of people under the influence of poetry dying of rapture; and perhaps a poetical jawbone may hav the same kind of effect on those who come under its influence.

But if the feat with the jawbone is to be understood metaphorically, are we to understand Samson's encounter with the lion in the same sense? And what shall be said of Samson's last and greatest feat, viz., pulling down the great arena in which his enemies had brought him in his blind, hairless, and humiliated condition to mock at and torture him? Shall we say that he "brought down the house with applause," as though we were speaking of Mr. Irving after he had played Louis XI.? Or must we regard the event as literally true?

Again. Both Elijah and Elisha were conjurers. One got his garments filled with wind and ascended like a balloon and then mysteriously disappeared; the other lay upon the poor Shunamite's dead son, "put his mouth upon his mouth, his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands, and he stretched himself upon the child and the flesh of the child waxed warm. Then he returned and walked in the house to and fro, and went up and stretched himself upon him, and the child sneezed seven times, and the child opened his eyes" (2 Kings iv, 34, 35). This looks like a consummate piece of jugglery.

And so I might go on and say the same of all the miracles in the Bible, whether narrated in the Old or New Testament. In view of modern science, miracles must be regarded as impossible; and I know not who is the more to blame, the pretended workers of miracles or those who deliberately recorded them to deceive the credulous in all the countries of the world. ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Powderly—Communism.

All at once it seems to hav dawned upon the editorial mind of the conservativ press that General Master Workman Powderly, in his educational process with the workingman, is given over to Communism!

How elementary instruction, in a new departure from the established, could avoid the well-defined common-sense tracks of the modern teachers of sociology, in preparing the common mind for the new social and industrials relations sought to take the place of the despotic past and present, is a question to be discussed on the affirmativ side from the strictly conservativ standpoint, and sustained by such like arguments as force suggests—deputy sheriffs, policemen, infantry, cavalry, and artillery, fetching in their lumbering train such verdicts as outrageous fines, imprisonments, and possibly deaths from suborned juries and befouled judges.

Of course, Powderly is Communistic, Socialistic, Nihilistic, radicalistic, Anarchistic—his huge craft floundering and straining among the vexed tides in a perfect archipelago of Scyllas, Charybdises, and Maelstroms. But mind you his ship is stanch, his sails snugly furled, his cordage hauled all taut, his pumps handled by strong arms, his compass perfect, and his quadrant at all times reliable. And don't you forget it.

As late editor of the National Socialist, a weekly paper, now defunct, published some six years ago at Cincinnati, Ohio, I ought to be regarded, in a degree, as authority in discussing the Platform and Declaration of Principles of the K. of L. Order. And, pointing to the seven last paragraphs of the platform, I say they embody almost all that the Socialists demand in their reorganization of society. But, say many, Socialism is not Communism. Perhaps not, I reply. Neither is it Nihilism, nor yet Anarchism, but all of them are classed in the dynamite-bomb-throwing category, and are spoken of by people unintelligent in such matters as deserving of being dumped in the same unsavory cesspool of reprobation.

To be able to clearly point out the distinctiv difference in the vilified -isms now antagonizing society would involve a very different line of reading than is found in the general newspapers of the day, but which, if read, would go far to show how much all of them were indebted to the same inspiration for their being.

Let the K. of L. beware of the satanic press, whose business will be to entangle the leaders during the incipient stages of organizing. We all know the tendency in debate to take exceptions to new proposals. To do so is incident to assemblages of ardent men under the inspiration of a great idea, and bickerings are unavoidable, and can be rendered harmless only by a determined spirit of concession.

While editing the paper spoken of above I at all times found myself in conflict with the Tartar element, fellows who spoke of the necessity of force, the individual ownership of arms, and the need of martial disciplin and drill to meet emergencies. And who knows how near they aimed at the ultimate needs? I was, however, and am still, a believer in the omnipotence of the American method, maintaining that it will be time enough to discuss force when capitalism seeks by legislation, judicial interference, or armed intervention to abate the potencies of the ballot-box. In season and out of season I rebuked the Tartars, denouncing them as Richard speaks of Richmond's army,

> Whom their o'ercloyed country vomits forth
> To desperate adventures and destruction.

The more clamorous of the Tartars were Germans, fellows who had deserted faderland to escape Bismarck, running from where they could achieve liberty only by hard knocks to a land where the ballot-box offered the wise arbitration of votes to right political wrongs. So much impressed was I at one time, when an outbreak seemed imminent in the city of Chicago, that I wrote to the governor of the state giving him to understand the facts that whatever of abuse of citizenship by the Socialists was apparent, the English-speaking section was to be relied on as American in their methods.

Now, after the ordeal Chicago has just passed through, not one of the English-speaking section figures among the disturbers of the peace. It is true A. R. Parsons belonged to the English-speaking section, but he had withdrawn to the German section, finding more congenial fellowship for his turbulent nature. And yet we all liked Parsons; he was an eloquent speaker and ardent partisan.

I daily scanned the reports from Chicago during the troublous days, and not one of my old comrades appeared on the black list. They are none the less Socialists now, however, than am I.

Let but the great organization, the Knights of Labor, gain the political ascendancy, legitimately secured, and all disturbing -isms in America, finding justice, will become harmless as Hybla bees.

All that is wanting to make the demand of the K. of L. Socialism pure and undefiled is the consolidation of the land from individual ownership of the acres into mere occupancy, with reserved claims to occupants already in possession, a claim which passes with the succeeding generation; so placing all citizens on a square footing, the land, by purchase, passing into the hands of the government, to be held in perpetuity for the use of its citizens.

Socialism holds and cherishes as a sacred truth that the land is not a marketable commodity any more than is man.

There is no concealing the fact that the worker has at last discovered that capital in individua l hands is but accumulations, more or less, of withheld wages.

The large majority of men hav not the faculty of amassing wealth, and, so knowing, the awakened spirit of justice demands that the aggregate of profits from all work, in order to be reached without interest-bearing bonds, mortgages, or any of the oppressiv appliances of greed backed by law, should hav a stable, radiating center—the government. In our present financial arrangements civilization is obstructed, while the distributions to the working-man, by whom all wealth comes, is dishonest and altogether inadequate—heartless, indeed, and brutal.

A crisis is impending, deputy-marshals, policemen, infantry, cavalry, and artillery to the contrary notwithstanding. Bismarck is but a will-o'-the-wisp, the czar a figment. To the government of Canada we say, Put up thy dagger, fisherman. The Ulster patriots even are but as drops in the bucket. All old things are passing away, hurling in their tornado passage venerable customs, puerilities of ancient political economics, Dugald Stewarts, Malthuses, and college traditions. Nihilism, as far as the past is concerned, will triumph—that is, the past will be nihil.

The sticklers of society may see "assertions but no arguments" in my words. But really, now, is it not more likely that the past was wrong than that the present errs in its views of human government? If not, then is there nothing in human experience. The fathers were wise in their generation, no more. The world has cast aside the assurance, so liberally dispensed by the mythologies, Christian and pagan, giving them but a derisiv smile when obtruding themselvs upon the attention.

It is not the Socialist that sticklers for the established hav to dread; the individual can be managed. It is in Socialism, which, like Milton's angels, cannot but by annihilation die, that the deathless foe of unjust society is to be found. J. M.

Where Paine's Ashes Rest.

From the New York World.

Within the green and flower-bedecked realm of Orange, way-up on the hills of New Jersey, there livs a little, hazel-eyed woman named Mrs. S. Stanton, who is a relativ of the well-known Cobbett, who, in 1835, removed Thomas Paine's body to Liverpool, England, and allowed his bones to moulder in the grave of an English churchyard. Mrs. Stanton told the World reporter who interviewed her this morning of her knowledge of the story.

"The story told by the World is true," she began. "Poor Paine's body now lies in a British tomb, and I hope his bones will hav peaceful rest at last. I wish you had time and opportunity to see Mr. Cobbett's niece at Philadelphia. She could tell you the story far better than I can, with only the fragments at command.

"History has already told the world who and what Paine was. I can only speak in reverence of his name. But, in touching this subject, and in alluding to the removal of the noted Liberal's bones to England, I hope you will state that they were borne just as tenderly from Mr. Cobbett's home at Farnham to the Liverpool churchyard, where they now lie, as were ever carried the remains of the greatest Christian in the land. My heart bleeds to think that a disrespectful word should be uttered regarding Paine's remains. In his vagaries there was a pleasing vein of sympathy; a wealth of golden thought crowned all his utterances, and I, believing so truly in the integrity of his nature, cannot allow the opportunity to pass without speaking in his praise. The bones of the celebrated Infidel were taken to England by Cobbett and placed in an appropriate tomb. They should hav been laid in a receiving vault, and then a monument to his memory be erected beside the sepulcher. His works liv after him, and the kindness of his great and noble heart has been the keynote to many songs of praise."

New Jersey and Her Laws.

The constitution and the statutes of New Jersey seem to conflict, and it is for the New Jersey courts to say which is valid. In Article I. of the Constitution adopted in 1844, the following is affirmed:

"Sec. 4. No person shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right merely on account of his religious principles.

"Sec. 5. Every person may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right. No law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press."

But among the crimes enumerated is one called blasphemy, which is borne upon by the following statute:

"If any person shall wilfully blaspheme the holy name of God, by denying, cursing, or contumeliously reproaching his being or providence, or by cursing or contumeliously reproaching Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost, or the Christian religion or the holy word of God (that is, the canonical scriptures contained in the books of the Old and New Testaments), or by profane scoffing at or exposing them, or any of them, to contempt and ridicule, then every person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine, not exceeding two hundred dollars, or imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding twelve months, or both."

Between the broad guarantee of the constitution that every man in New Jersey shall hav the right to freely speak his sentiments upon all subjects, and the narrow limitations of this statute there is inevitable conflict, and that conflict just now promises to be waged around the person of our friend Reynolds, with the state prison in the background if he be defeated. "Every person may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press." So said the framers of New Jersey's constitution, which is the fundamental law of the state. "If any person shall expose the canonical books of the Old and New Testament, or any of them, to contempt and ridicule, then every person so offending shall be fined or imprisoned at hard labor." So said the bucolic Solons who met at Trenton to adulate their deity. "All," in New Jersey, does not mean everyone, the whole. It means some, a few, as many as we hav a mind to allow, and the constitution should be changed to read that "every person may freely speak his sentiments upon such subjects as we, the Christians, children of God and inheritors of the earth, are graciously pleased to permit." That is what the statute against blasphemy means, and it is well known that state statutes ought to agree with state constitutions.

But this is not all of New Jersey's inconsistency. The common law of the state in regard to witnesses, as formulated by Nixon's Digest (from 1709 to 1868, 4th ed.) is this:

"Persons not of the Christian religion may be sworn according to the ceremonies of their religion, as a Mohammedan on the Koran, etc. But unless the person believes there is a God who will punish him if he swears falsely, he cannot be admitted as a witness."

Nixon givs no law as his authority, neither does he cite the cases upon which this is presumably based. His "law," therefore, we presume, is a survival of old English practice, as incongruous in this century as would appear the dress of the people of England of three hundred years ago. But the statute law upon swearing, affirmation, and declaration of witnesses is very explicit. The Revised Statutes of New Jersey, published in 1877, contain the following:

"26. That every person who shall be permitted or required to take an oath in any case where by law an oath is allowed or required, and who shall allege that he or she is conscientiously scrupulous of taking an oath, shall, instead of the form of the oath, be permitted to make his or her solemn affirmation or declaration; and if such person shall choose to affirm, it shall be in words following, to wit:

"I, ——, do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm.

"But, if such person shall choose to declare, it shall be in the words following, to wit:

"I, ——, do declare, in the presence of almighty God, the witness of the truth of what I say.

"Either of which forms shall be as good and effectual in law as an oath taken in the usual form, in which affirmation or declaration the words, 'So help me God,' shall be omitted.

"27. That every person who is or shall be empowered or required to tender and administer an oath in the usual form shall be and hereby is empowered and required to tender and administer the affirmation or declaration aforesaid, when requested to that purpose by any such scrupulous person as aforesaid.

"That in all cases where, by any act of the legislature of this state now in force, or hereafter to be made, an oath is or shall be allowed or required, the affirmation or declaration, in the form above prescribed, of any such scrupulous person as aforesaid, shall be allowed and taken instead of an oath in the usual form, although no provision for that purpose is or shall be made in such act.

"Every person must be sworn unless he alleges that he is conscientiously scrupulous" (Ibid).

The difference between Nixon's Digest and the statute law is apparent. The one shuts out Freethinkers, the other compels officials to take the affirmation of all who hav conscientious scruples against taking the oath. If it is not a conscientious scruple which prevents an Atheist from swearing by a God in whom he does not believe, or a Theist from swearing on a book which he regards as injurious in its teaching, we know not what the feeling may be called. Criminals in New Jersey may freely testify, but upright and conscientious Freethinkers may not. Great is New Jersey, and the kingdom of God shall be hers!

But New Jersey is consistent in one thing. As she takes her law as to the competency of witnesses from the practice of the English courts of a century or two ago, so does she get her blasphemy law, almost verbatim, from the statutes of the New England provinces. One of the earliest of Massachusetts' laws was upon the subject of blasphemy, the third and nineteenth sections of which read as follows

"SEC. 3. If any person within this jurisdiction, whether Christian or pagan, shall wittingly and willingly presume to blaspheme the holy name of God, Father, Son, or Holy Ghost, with direct, express, presumptuous, or high-handed blasphemy, either by wilful or obstinate denying the true God, or his creation, or government of the world, or shall curse God in like manner, or reproach the holy religion of God, as if it were but a politic device, to keep ignorant men in awe; or shall utter any other kind of blasphemy of the like nature and degree, they shall be put to death, Levit. xxi, 15, 16.

"SEC. 19. Albeit faith be not wrought by the sword, but by the word; and therefore such pagan Indians as hav submitted themselvs to our government, though we would not neglect any due helps to bring them on to grace and to the means of it; yet we compel them not to the Christian faith, nor to the profession of it, either by force of arms, or by penal laws: nevertheless, seeing the blaspheming of the true God cannot be excused by any ignorance or infirmity of human nature, the eternal power and Godhead being known by the light of natnre, and the creation of the world; and common reason requireth every state and society of men to be more careful of preventing the dishonor and contempt of the most high God (in whom we all consist) than of any mortal princes or magistrates; it is therefore ordered, and decreed by this court for the honor of the eternal God, who only we worship, and serve, that no person within this jurisdiction, whether Christian, or pagan, shall wittingly, and willingly presume to blaspheme his holy name, either by wilful, or obstinate denying the true God, or his creation, or government of the world, or shall curse God, or reproach the holy religion of God, as if it were but a public device to keep ignorant men in awe, nor shall uttter any other eminent kind of blasphemy of the like nature, and degree. If any person, or persons whatsoever within our jurisdiction shall break this law, they shall be put to death."

In 1646 the penalty had shrunk to banishment, according to the law:

"SEC. 1. Although no human power be lord over the faith and consciences of men, yet because such as bring in damnable heresies, tending to the subversion of the Christian faith, and destruction of the souls of men, ought duly to be restrained from such notorious impieties:

"It is therefore ordered and declared by the court; that if any Christian within this jurisdiction, shall go about to subvert and destroy the Christian faith and religion, by broaching and maintaining any damnable heresies; as denying the immortality of the soul, or resurrection of the body, or any sin to be repented of in the regenerate, or any evil done by the outward man to be accounted sin, or denying that Christ gave himself a ransom for our sins, or shall affirm that we are not justified by his death and righteousness, but by the perfections of our own works, or shall deny the morality of the Fourth Commandment, or shall openly condemn or oppose the baptizing of infants, or shall purposely depart the congregation at the administration of that ordinance, or shall deny the ordinance of magistracy, or their lawful authority, to make war, or to punish the outward breaches of the first table, or shall endeavor to seduce others to any of the errors or heresies above mentioned; every such person continuing obstinate therein, after due means of conviction, shall be sentenced to banishment."

In 1697 the following "act against Atheism and blasphemy" was passed:

"Be it declared and enacted by the lieutenant-governor, council and representativs, convened in general court or assembly, and it is enacted by the authority of the same, that if any person shall presume wilfully to blaspheme the holy name of God, Father, Son, or Holy Ghost, either by denying, cursing, or reproaching the true God, his creation or government of the world, or by denying, cursing or reproaching the holy word of God, that is, the canonical scriptures contained in the books of the Old and New Testament, namely, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Samuel, Kings, Kings, Chronicles, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, The Song of Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Acts, Romans, Corinthians, Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Thessalonians, Thessalonians, Timothy, Timothy, Titus, Philemon, Hebrews, James, Peter, Peter, John, John, John, Jude, Revelation, everyone so offending shall be punished by imprisonment, not exceeding six months, and until they find sureties for the good behavior, by sitting in the pillory, by whipping, boring through the tongue with a red-hot iron, or sitting upon the gallows with a rope about their neck, at the discretion of the court of assize, and general gaol delivery, before which the trial shall be, according to the circumstances, which may aggravate or alleviate the offense.

"Provided, that no more than two of the forementioned punishments shall be inflicted for one and the same fact."

In 1834, when Abner Kneeland was imprisoned for saying, "Universalists believe in a god which I do not; but believe that their god, with his moral attributes (aside from nature itself), is nothing but a chimera of their own imagination," the law read as follows:

"BE it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, That if any person shall wilfully blaspheme the holy name of God, by denying, cursing, or contumeliously reproaching God, his creation, government or final judging of the world, or by cursing, or reproaching Jesus Christ, or the Holy Ghost, or by cursing or contumeliously reproaching the Holy Word of God, that is, the canonical scriptures, contained in the books of the Old and New Testaments, or exposing them, or any part of them, to contempt and ridicule; which books are as follows: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Samuel, Kings, Kings, Chronicles, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Mica, Nahhum Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Acts, Romans, Corinthians, Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Thessalonians, Thessalonians, Timothy, Timothy, Titus, Philemon, Hebrews, James, Peter, Peter, John, John, John, Jude, Revelations; every person so offending shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, by sitting in the pillory, by whipping, or by sitting on the gallows, with a rope about the neck, or binding to the good behavior, at the discretion of the Supreme Judicial Court before whom the conviction may be, according to the aggravation of the offense."

It will be observed that New Jersey has borrowed the phraseology of this law, omitting only the names of the books of the Bible and changing the punishment. In the enactment of her blasphemy law New Jersey jealously maintains her reputation of being about a century behind the age. In arresting Mr. Reynolds under this statute she vindicates her piety, and in legally defending the myth of the creation she shows the extent of her knowledge upon the scientific questions of the day. "Jersey justice" is to-day a synonym of legal injustice. If the Christians of Morris county succeed in imprisoning Mr. Reynolds, "Jersey justice" will still further be a term of reproach. It is for the grand jury to say whether they will indict a man for taking advantage of the privilege guaranteed by New Jersey's constitution, or whether by throwing the case out of court they will lift up their state to the plane of civilization. They well may ponder Professor Hunter's remark that blasphemy laws survive as a dangerous weapon in the hands of any fool or fanatic who likes to set them in motion.

The Methodist Mission Million.

The Methodists of this country are straining every nerve, and pulling upon every possible string that reaches the source of religious enthusiasm, to raise a million dollars for foreign missions. This sum could hardly be devoted to any other honest cause where, in our judgment, it would do less good. In the first place, the inhabitants of so-called heathen countries hav a religion of their own, and in most cases it is superior to Christianity. It is a superstition, to be sure, but they can gain nothing by exchanging it for another no better, if as good.

The plea popularly made is that the missionaries carry civilization with them to foreign lands. Why not, then, call it a Civilization Fund? That cannot be done because the claim would not hold water. We know little of the effects of Christianity on the heathen. The reports of mission work which the American is in the habit of reading are written by the missionaries themselvs. It is only now and then that the heathen is called to the witness-stand, and when he is called, it is a very sorry indictment which he brings against the missionaries. There is at present in this country a high-caste Brahman, of India, Gopal Vinayak Joshee by name. He is lecturing upon the manners and customs of his people; and if the misguided persons who are sending money to convert the Brahmans could listen to his casual remarks on missionary work in India, they would receive both profit and enlightenment. A few extracts from his lecture would not be out of place here. In an address delivered before the Manhattan Liberal Club last winter, and since published, he said, among other things:

"Ninety-nine per cent of the people who contribute to support the so-called missionaries are entirely in the dark as to what they hav been doing in foreign lands. If they were to know one-hundredth part of the mischief done by missionaries, they would stand aghast. For the last sixty years these missionaries hav been in league with all the political and commercial parties. I hav been with them for the past twenty-two years. The more I look into their characters, the darker is the dye that stains them. They hav been bribing men to embrace Christianity. I was a boy of twelve when I first came in contact with a missionary. Our parents told us not to go near him; he would, however, force his presence upon us, and distribute some tracts, which our parents generally described as sinful. He stood at one of the corners of the street, and preached about God's only begotten son and salvation, and we all laughed at him as if he were a madman or an idiot. He distributed sweets among the boys and girls, and thus tried to get a hearing. In the course of time he seduced one or two young men and made them Christians. We, therefore, called him a man-catcher. He afterwards secured the good influence of two revenue officers, which converted our laughter into silence. Thus, my dear friends, sweets, money, force, and influence entrapped and waylaid the needy. . . . We saw missionaries indulge in drinking. Nations borrow vices more readily than virtues. Our people, therefore, took to drinking and brothels, in spite of religious injunctions to the contrary. This, in part, is what we hav derived from your religious teachers.

"One day I was reading my lesson to the lady [a missionary's wife], when she interrupted me, saying, 'Gopal [that is my name], my husband works very hard, but finds no one to baptize. Many promis, but none come forward. If he does not get one to baptize in a short time he will be broken in health, and go mad.' What do you think must hav been my reply to this importunity? I sincerely felt for her and her husband. I offered myself for baptism, if that would satisfy their minds, but on one condition—that it should not be made public. This conditional baptism was not to their taste. They wanted to baptize me openly, and then fill columns of papers with the result of their strenuous efforts and labors in the cause of religion, that they might get addition to their salaries and some titles to their names.

"In this country they circulate absurd stories about my country. They report that Hindoo mothers throw their babes into the Ganges. They report that men sacrifice themselvs before Juggernaut. They say that women are tortured and put to death. They report that the heathen know no God; they are ignorant, superstitious, and idolatrous. This is all false. The missionaries fabricate stories in order to raise funds in their own countries for their support in foreign lands. They do not work, but liv like potentates, surrounded by luxuries and comforts. We do not envy them, but let them not misrepresent facts and tamper with our religion; let them not persecute those who bring to light their wrong doings.

"The missionaries hav set children against parents, brothers against brothers, and husbands against wives and vice versa. Converts are deadly enemies of their own countrymen. Missionaries hav employed outlaws to break Hindoo idols. They hav influenced judges to hear cases for dissolution of marriages on the plea that, 'My husband is too old; he is suffering from consumption. I was mated to him against my will.'"

Speaking of one missionary with whom he was acquainted, the lecturer said: "He had been working in the field for ten years without converting a single soul to Christianity." It would seem to be the duty of those interested in foreign missions to inquire into the truth of these charges before sending more missionaries, at least to India. And there is no reason to doubt that what is true of missionaries in India is true of missionaries in China, Japan, and elsewhere. Addressing the mission enthusiasts of his day, Christ is reported to hav said: "Ye compass land and sea to make one proselyte, and when he is made ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselvs." Mr. Joshee's testimony in the last paragraph which we hav quoted seems to point to a similar state of facts with regard to the missionaries of to-day.

This million dollars ought not to be raised and devoted to the purpose in view. The better uses to which such a sum could be put are almost innumerable. The amount of good which will be accomplished by sending a few hundred religious enthusiasts out of this country will be scarcely appreciable here, and will be much overbalanced by the deleterious effects produced elsewhere.

Opposed to Education.

The remark of the Rev. Patrick F. McSweeny, in a late issue of the Catholic World, that "secular instruction is no doubt useful and perhaps necessary, especially in a republic," givs a hint as to the place all Catholics occupy regarding education. "Secular instruction," of course, includes all mental training except that afforded by religious teachings.

For one reason it is a pleasure, comparativly, to deal with Catholic theologians and their ideas. This reason is that with the opinion of one on a religious subject ascertained, the opinions of the others, and of the church as a whole, is no longer uncertain. They all think through the same quill. Not a papist in the world favors more than enough education to make a Catholic. The Romanist regards even national prosperity as more than a doubtful blessing. Father Lambert, in his "Notes on Ingersoll" voices the doctrin of the whole body to which he belongs when he says that "prosperity leads to decay, national, individual, intellectual, moral, and physical." This view is held by the church because it has been found that the church thrives best when times are hard. It is healthiest during a pestilence, and waxes fat on famin. All other hope gone, the dupe of superstition appeals to his priest, who, with equal pleasure, administers the last sacrament or takes the last cent. It is because the church is the foe of human interests that she regards prosperity as an evil.

The latest deliverance on the education question is from the Dublin Review, a Catholic organ of high authority. The editor, speaking of the advantages of ignorance, says:

"We are very far from meaning that ignorance is the Catholic youth's best preservativ against intellectual danger, but it is a very powerful one, nevertheless, and those who deny this are but inventing a theory in the very teeth of manifest facts. A Catholic destitute of intellectual tastes, whether in a higher or a lower rank, may, probably enough, be tempted to idleness, frivolity, gambling, sensuality; but in none but the very rarest cases will he be tempted to that which, in the Catholic view, is an immeasurably greater calamity than any of these, or all put together—deliberate doubt of the truth of his religion."

Freethinkers hav always held, against the opposition of the ill-informed, that the church is intrenched behind a breastwork of ignorance; and not alone is that true, but between disbelief and belief, as a defense for the latter, are all the vices which the Review enumerates. If a Catholic is tempted toward inquiry or doubt, or toward intellectual pursuits, he is warned of his danger by the priest, who givs him these vices as a refuge, with the assurance that all of them together are an immeasurably less calamity than deliberate doubt of the truth of his religion. Without stopping to consider how much worth saving would be left of a person given over to idleness, frivolity, gambling, and sensuality, it must be admitted that if the Christian religion is true, the position of the Review is impregnable. It can matter very little, in the face of eternity, what a man's conduct may hav been during his brief stay upon earth, provided his belief has never faltered. And since that belief is endangered by education, the Catholics' conclusion that education is dangerous is altogether unassailable by any Christian.

The only escape from this dilemma is an entire repudiation of the superstition called the Christian religion. That education is inimical to faith is as true as that light destroys darkness. Knowledge is described by a circle, outside of which is the unknown, the domain of conjecture and belief; and we cannot enlarge our circle of knowledge without lessening that outer domain. The more knowledge, therefore, the less belief. The question is whether we shall take the counsel of the Catholic church and contract that circle, or whether it shall go on forever widening with the growth of intelligence and Freethought. There is but one answer to this question. The world has grown better only as it has grown wiser, and it is unreasonable to believe that that order will ever be reversed.

The Catholic church to-day is the great enemy of education; and the enemy of education can only be regarded as an enemy of human progress.

During the first part of the so-called Anarchist "trial" at Chicago a witness named Gilmer testified that on the night of the Haymarket Square meeting he saw August Spies in an alley lighting a bomb. Last week a man named Krumm, who very much resembles Spies in personal appearance, came forward to explain that at the time mentioned by Gilmer he was in the alley named, having resorted thither to get out of the wind and light his pipe. As far as the truth has been elicited, it seems to be that a crazy fellow named Schnaubelt lighted and threw the bomb, and that he is the only person directly responsible for the result. Schnaubelt is reported dead, a body supposed to be his having been found in the river at Erie, Pa.

One of our writers, in another portion of the issue of this week, pays Mr. Terence V. Powderly some very high compliments. Mr. Powderly's compass, he says, borrowing a simile from the sea, is perfect, and his quadrant at all times reliable. We are sorry that this is not so, but the fact is that it is not. Mr. Powderly once told Mr. E. A. Stevens that when the Catholic church told him to do one thing and the Knights of Labor told him to do another, he should obey the church. In a history of the order of which Mr Powderly is head, given in the Philadelphia Press of August 1st, occurs this paragraph upon the religious attitude of the Knights:

"The attitude of the Knights of Labor toward the church has been reverent and conciliatory. When Mr. Powderly was elected general master workman, before he would accept the trust he conferred with the late Archbishop McCloskey with the consent of the executiv board and laid bare the innermost objects of the order."

We contend, and cite the history of the Catholic church to support us, that the man whose compass in adjusted and whose quadrant is squared by that institution is the very worst possible navigator. And the workingmen of this country will find it out before many years. The church intends to keep the people under, and Mr. Powderly is but a tool in her hands.

Cheer for Mr. Reynolds.

JOBSTOWN, N. J., July 31, 1886.

FRIEND REYNOLDS, My Dear Sir: I see by to-day's papers that you hav been outrageously maltreated by the bigots of Boonton. It is the most outlandish thing that has happened for many a day, if the account in the New York World be true. If it is so, I hope you make a test-case out of it, as I think it time to know if we hav the right to think for ourselvs and express what we think. If you need assistance, the members of the Union will try and aid you all they can; we will do our part. All the members of the Union regret very much to hear of the outrage on you, but hope it will work for the good of the cause in the end. We say, Stick to them and show a good fight, and let every Liberal help pay the bill.

All send kind regards to you and Mrs. Reynolds, and say, Fight for the right to the end.

Yours, SAMUEL R. WETHERILL,
Sec. Jobstown Secular Union.

PHILADELPHIA, August 5, 1886.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Please find inclosed $5 to help Reynolds in his fight for free speech in Boonton. The action of the Booth family will help to redeem that name.

Very truly, E. M. DAVIS.

GEO. SMITH writes from Brisbane, in Queensland, Australia, to the National Reformer: "Freethought matters in this city hav lately received an impetus, through the visit here of Dr. J. L. York from America. He has been delivering lectures in the Academy of Music here every Sunday for over three months to crowded houses, the average audience being about a thousand persons. A Mr. H. A. Long, of Glasgow, also lately arrived here, and now advertises an 'Anti-Infidel Campaign,' and his intention of fighting and slaying that hydra 'Infidelity.' From what he has done so far, we are glad he is here, as he is doing our cause more good than the cause of Christ. He implies that he has debated with Mr. Bradlaugh, but we doubt it very much, as we cannot find any account of debates between him and our esteemed chief, Mr. Bradlaugh. A series of debates hav been arranged between Dr. York and Mr. Long. After these debates Dr. York is to proceed on a lecturing tour through the northern parts of this colony. Before returning to America he will open up a lot of new ground, and it is hoped do much good in forming branch societies."

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $7—$5 for the Tent Fund and $2 for TRUTH SEEKER illustrations: We are pleased to learn that the Congress will be held in New York. My wife and I will surely attend. W. WHITTICK.

SUNLIGHT, NEB., July 21, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find 25 cents for the lithograph of Charles Darwin.

We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a number of years, and cannot get along without it. The illustrations in the papers are just splendid. They speak volumes. They do more for Freethought than a great many lecturers do. We are going to hav five lectures delivered at Greenwood, Neb., in a very short time, by the Hon. J. E. Remsburg. We expect a treat when he comes such as one does not meet with every day. This is a good field for Freethought lectures, as there are a great number of skeptics here.

MR. EDITOR: In your paper of July 17th I think J. Wm. Lloyd "hits the nail on the head" exactly in speaking of some Liberals (so called). They believe in Liberalism so far as it conforms strictly to their pet theories, but just let the opposition say a word and they are up in arms at once. I am often told by Liberal friends that I am too Liberal. Perhaps so; still, I go more on moral suasion than force. I believe in force only to combat force. Mr. Lloyd has given my views fully, with the exception of being an Anarchist, which I am not, but a Communist, which I suppose some of the "bretherin'" count equally as bad. I hope more of the "boys" will declare themselvs Liberals in the fullest sense.

E. E. PARK.

LUNENBURG, MASS., July 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Giv my respects to your artist for the forcible conception of the critters who hav done their work up to this day. The last illustration is a little too problematical. We may never see Catholicity and Protestantism in a death-grip, but rather see them billing and cooing in loving embrace.

The Protestant church is weak, and they will unite, and the war is to be fought on the line of Freethought, and free speech, and free press, and with great help from the Spiritualists, which hav been, and will be, our right bower.

"To hell with the pope!" sounds heroic to-day, but that won't be the tune fifty years hence. The Protestants should hav been as wary of Sunday-schools as has been the mother church. Sunday-schools were laid hold of by the Protestant church as its sheet anchor, but the dry-rot seized it the day it inaugurated its first school to make church timber.

My benediction upon all who labor for freedom of opinion on all subjects that interest the growth of man.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4.25. Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Men, Women, and Gods," by Miss Gardener. The 25 cents will giv the book a "starter" for its destination. I read the paper carefully and am greatly pleased with it. Would like to see it double its circulation every year. Tell some of your speakers to come this way; we will do the best we can to patronize them. Fine climate, excellent fruits, hospitable people, plenty of money. You know things are booming down this way. If there is a gentleman or lady among your readers who would like to liv where it never thunders and lightens, never freezes, never snows, where you can wear your summer clothes in winter, and vice versa, in a land of sunshine and flowers, in a land of prosperity and abundance, tell them to come this way, and upon their arrival we will open up a keg of nails. I like the pictures and am ready to put up more to keep them going if necessary. There are many Liberals in this locality; sky-pilots few and weak in the knees. ALPH. N. BURGESS.

MEADOW BROOK FARMS, MASS., August 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Having just finished reading a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I feel impelled to write you a brief letter, expressing my appreciation of the same, and also my admiration of your indomitable courage and perseverance in editing and publishing a paper so pronounced in its views concerning matters of religion, and other things of importance relativ to the welfare of humanity. It seems to me that it must require not a little "nerve," situated as you are in the very hotbed of Romanism, to publish such a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav often wondered if you ever apprehended any bodily injury from that source. If you remember, history tells us that the dangers which surrounded Henry IV. of France from the Catholics were such that, in order to protect himself from being assassinated, he followed the advice of his friends, abjured Protestantism, and apparently became converted to the Catholic faith. Oliver Cromwell, too, you recollect, on account of his religious views, wore an armor under his clothes, for fear of being assassinated. I hope you may never be obliged to protect yourself in that way; but when I read that letter from one of the "Sisters" in the last TRUTH SEEKER, it occurred to me that something awful might happen to you should you persist in making light of the holy Catholic church. "To be forewarned is to be forearmed," you know. But what a diabolical invention of man is this so-called Christianity! For years did I believe in it, until my eyes and ears were open to light and reason. Yes, believed it, simply because taught to believe it by my parents. My grandfather was deacon of a Congregational church up among the granit hills of old New Hampshire, and actually considered it a crime to open his mouth on the Sabbath day, unless it was to offer up a benediction to the Almighty. My mother still retains that belief, and is grieved to think that her only child and daughter should be so indifferent to the influence of orthodoxy. Well, thanks to my husband, and the first liberal paper I ever read—the Boston Investigator, which I first saw about three years since—I hav learned to think differently, and all those silly Bible stories taught me in my earlier days I hav ceased to believe, and I now look back upon my past religious life with absolute disgust. LILLIAN ADELE SPENCER.

HANNIBAL, MO., August 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Brother J. K. Chesley and myself officiated, by request of the deceased, at the funeral of Mrs. Conrad, who died recently in this city. She was an old resident, a lady of more than ordinary intelligence, and the funeral was well attended by her Christian neighbors, especially the ladies. Brother Chesley gave a very interesting sketch of her life and progress out of Christianity into Liberalism, after which I read the first five sections and the eighth section in Dr. Ayres's "Secular Funeral and Marriage Handbook." An impromptu choir, composed of Liberals, sang with good effect several of the funeral hymns from the same valuable book, and at the grave I read Selection No. 16. All present listened with profound attention to those beautiful and appropriate passages, and many flattering comments hav since been made, even by the Christian ladies. Why do Liberals ever call on the clergy to bury their dead? If a necessity for such a thing ever existed, it has certainly passed away since the publication of Dr. Ayres's book. F. H. RAU.

WELLAND, ONT., July 25, 1886.

TO THE READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Friends: I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last seven years, and now, at the age of fourscore years, when I find all my faculties are fast failing me, I wish to express my sense of obligation to the many able contributors to that paper, as having been very helpful to me in dispelling some of those ignorant and superstitious notions in which from infancy I had been trained to believe, and in their place to hav had my mind so far enlightened as to be able to look upon things from a more scientific and truthful standpoint, having become better acquainted with nature and her laws. To die is as natural as to be born, and no more to be dreaded. Indeed, to old age, when your faculties are so worn out as to be unable to be useful to your friends and society, the ties to life become much loosened, and, like ripened fruit, you are ready to drop off; and it is a kind interposition of nature to relieve you of a burden you hav become less able to bear. I do not see anything in nature to lead to the belief that I shall hav less justice done me in the future than in the past.

I hav the kindliest of feeling toward all my Liberal and truth-seeking friends, and wish them to know it.

OSHKOSH, WIS., July 23, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Many years ago, when the Erie Canal was in full blast, there was a very rough set of boatmen employed on it, and it was not a strange occurrence to see one boat's crew jump ashore and fight another crew, just for the fun of it, and many of the men were noted for cursing by rule. Well, one Saturday afternoon a certain captain was on his way to Buffalo, and had arrived at a lock which was not ready for his boat, and the said captain commenced to swear by rule, and not only the lock-tender got it, but everybody in general. While the captain was so engaged, a preacher came riding along upon the highway road, which ran parallel with the towpath, and, hearing the captain using so much profanity, thought it his duty to get down and correct him. So, dismounting from his horse, he approached the captain, and, touching him lightly on the shoulder, said, "Captain, where are you going?" "Why," said the captain, "I am going to Buffalo, by God! if I can get there." "No, you are not," said the preacher; "you are going to hell." "Just my God-damned luck," said the captain. "But," continued he, addressing the preacher, "where are you going?" "I am going to Albany to preach for a friend of mine to-morrow." "I'll be damned if you are," said the captain; "you are going into that canal;" and, suiting the action to the word, he caught him by the collar of the coat and the bosom of his trousers and threw him in. By this time the lock was ready, and the captain went on his way, rejoicing that he had been instrumental in spreading the gospel.

MORAL.—If this preacher had minded his own business he would not hav got wet. G. M. H.

MARYVILLE, MO., July 25, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Once more a good Christian has gone straight to Jesus via hemp. It is the case of Joe Jump, who was executed at Gallatin, Mo., Friday the 23d inst., for the murder of W. C. Gladson last December. The condemned man, having made "his peace with the great judge," stepped boldly upon the scaffold, with the air of one who was conscious that he was going to pass from a world of trouble to one of eternal happiness. The criminal was, of course, accompanied by his "spiritual adviser," Rev. W. W. Buchanan, who said, "As far as spiritual counsel is concerned, the condemned does not need that now. His preparation to meet his maker has been already made, and he is satisfied." Before starting heavenward, Jump confessed that he and his accessory, Smith—who is going to take the same route the 6th of August, and meet Jump in the New Jerusalem—were guilty or having killed Gladson. After this confession, Jump sang a song, in which he requested the audience to join. It was the good old song, "Washed in the Blood of the Lamb."

After the song, the "spiritual adviser" offered a prayer for the murderer's soul; the murdered man, of course, was forgotten. At the conclusion of the prayer, the murderer sang another song, "Is My Name Written There?" after which the doomed man was heard to say, "I am ready," and he forthwith started on his journey for the heavenly kingdom.

According to the "Christian scheme of salvation," Jump has repented, made his peace, been washed in the blood of the Lamb, and is now comfortably settled in Abraham's bosom, while his victim, not having had the advantages offered to Jump, is roasting in an orthodox hell.

Well, Maryville has passed through a week's siege, known as the Sam Jones camp-meeting. A dozen speakers were present, the most of whom were fine orators; but last Sunday was the day for the Rev. Psalm Jones, and about eight thousand people congregated on the fair-grounds for the sake of listening to a disconnected harang for an hour and a half.

One week from to-day I go to Savannah, to meet Rev. Mr. Damon in debate on "Genesis and Geology," after which I start for the far West to grow up with the country. I hav the promis of some subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I will try and secure before I leave.

GEORGE H. DAWES.

SPRINGVILLE, UTAH, July 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot refrain from expressing the desire of my heart that I am with you and all the noble men and women who are engaged in a work that is improving and benefiting humanity—assisting them to get out of bondage, to throw off priestcraft, and all others who oppress them.

I think we hav some of the most intelligent writers for our TRUTH SEEKER that can be found in the world, and it should be in every home in our country, if not in all the world.

I feel anxious for others to see and read it, but the religious class seem afraid of it and condemn it without investigation, knowing that if they read it they must giv up their religion. As one said to me, a person who would read THE TRUTH SEEKER would apostatize in less than a year.

This Christianity here is the main thing in the way of getting subscribers. We must convert a person first from Christianity, and then we are not sure of his subscribing. Those who care nothing for religion are generally indifferent in the matter, and so it is. But I shall continue to hunt, and may be successful sooner or later. I trust our old subscribers are all doing the best they can. Those belonging to churches dare not, with very few exceptions, publicly express their real opinions when they would be in our favor, fearing the power that rules over them.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is looked upon here by Christian people as a wicked paper that wants to destroy all religion. They can't see that it only wants to destroy frauds and shams. They don't seem to want the truth unless it upholds their creed, and to apostatize is looked upon as a dreadful affair. So no one is allowed to change his views unless he wants to go to sheol.

Friend Putnam, I see by our paper, is "marching on" in his mission for the cause of Freethought, and doing all the good he can. I was truly glad to see him here, but regret that his visit was so short, which it had to be of necessity in order to giv all a chance to see and hear him. His lecture was splendid on "Universal Mental Liberty." We must do all the good we can and keep doing as long as we stay here. Our books and records will show who are the world's benefactors. We must hav our libraries and gather in the good books and preserve them for others to read.

I send you another 50 cents to make up a dollar on the picture business (which to many speak louder than words), also 50 cents for the Bruno Monument Fund, which, to accommodate me, please see that the right man gets, and oblige LUKE WM. GALLUP.

MAYNARDVILLE, TENN., July 26, 286.

MR. EDITOR: The pictures, horrible! Horrible, sure enough, but not too much so to a Freethinker of an Infidel color. They do not represent the teachings of the clergy, and that old bundle of forgeries called the "Bible," strong enough; for if the clergy, priestcraft, and the Bible teach realities, the pictures are mere shadows. Let those who believe in an orthodox hell take a peep into it, and see the lurid, sulphurous flames of liquid fire dashing and splashing against the beach of the burning lake, and hear the screams of their fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, and infants not a span long, and then ask themselvs if this is not horrible, and if the God of such is not horrible. This looks more like the work of a devil than of a God, and yet it is the best he could do for the human family. All this does not horrify a Freethinker, for he knows it is a lie; but let a man believe it and it is shocking and horrible in the extreme. Now I ask, Can a picture come anywhere near the reality? It is only at best a faint shadow.

If hell-fire and brimstone are not hell-fire and brimstone; and Christ giving two and one-half gallons of his blood for the redemption of sinners is not Christ giving two and one-half gallons of his blood for the redemption of sinners; and if jerking a murderer to heaven at the end of a rope is not jerking a murderer to heaven at the end of a rope—let the clergy and priests, and all believers in Christianity, come forward and say so, and confess, and quit teaching it. Then, and not till then, will Freethinkers quit the horrible pictures. It will not do to back out or be scared out; that would be acknowledging the corn. The pictures are on a great mission, it seems, teaching the Christians the horrible stuff they are swallowing without thinking. No wonder it makes them sick. When they get well, they will be Freethinkers.

Now, my brother Freethinkers, you who oppose the cartoons on account of your Christian neighbors are very tender-footed. Are you not giving aid and favor to superstition, and wounding Freethought, in opposing the cartoons? This half-way, "milk-and-cider," won't do for an Infidel. Lay aside every vestige of superstition, and come right up to the help of Freethought against superstition in every shape. Help is what we want; don't retard our progress. Show the pictures to your Christian neighbors, and if they say, "Horrible!" and "Shocking!" ask them why believe the horrible things represented? Tell them to renounce it, and flee to the stronghold of Freethought and universal mental liberty. I ask you, my tender-footed brothers, to show one scratch of the pen or one stroke of the brush that goes beyond the teachings of priestcraft or Biblecraft. The cartoons are on a great mission, and are bound to accomplish great results.

T. H. BUTCHER.

WEST UNION, O., Aug. 2, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Partly for amusement, but chiefly to inspire with enthusiasm the many laborers in the Liberal cause, permit me a brief indulgence in vanity, on account of the Infidel honor which is being conferred on the name of Beck through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

First, there is W. A. Beck, secretary of the Secular Society at Mechanicsburg, Ill. I feel proud to find the name of Beck in this honorable connection, but the vanity which prompts this communication is born of the fact that J. F. Beck has lately had the audacity and egotism to duplicate himself in the far West, and appear as one of the contributors to the Campaign Fund of the American Secular Union upon the recent visit of our noble Putnam to Butte City, Montana, and also managed to receive honorable mention in said Putnam's "News and Notes," and all without my consent; hence the blame of all this audacity, vanity, and egotism must rest on J. F. Beck, of Butte City, Montana, even to the production of this letter, which would not hav been written if said J. F. Beck had not made himself so numerous. I, J. F. Beck, at this end of the line, write this communication only in humility and self-defense, that I may not appear particeps criminis in this duplication of J. F. Beck, which was done wholly without my knowledge or consent. Neither do I wish to steal that widespread Infidel celebrity which I might acquire by seeming to stand with one foot at West Union, Ohio, and the other at Butte City, Montana, with the great Mississippi valley under my thumb, à la the Catholic cardinal in one of Heston's or John's inimitable cartoons. However, I do not wish to ignominiously shield myself from such fame and honor as may be justly mine, hence beg the privilege of entering a plea of guilty to the few following counts—and the list might be considerably extended: First, I am the J. F. Beck who recently sent a new subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER to encourage the publisher to keep up those grand truth-telling cartoons, and I hope to send quite a number more this fall and winter. Second, I am guilty of authorship of all matter in THE TRUTH SEEKER signed J. F. Beck, up to date, so far as I know. Third, I am guilty of being the first mover in the grand Remsburg camp-meeting which was held here last fall, in which we had five lectures by J. E. Remsburg and two by C. Fannie Allyn; but in this good work I finally secured the assistance of about twenty-five brave helpers, first and nearest being Col. D. P. W. Eylar, of West Union, Ohio; and greatest in financial aid and unsurpassed in earnestness and enthusiasm were Virginia E. and Newton Vance, of Concord, Ky., and James H. Feurt, of Portsmouth, Ohio, and others who did their parts nobly. Fourth count, I am guilty now of having just secured the engagement of Samuel P. Putnam for the last three evenings of September, and these same brave helpers who assisted last year are coming to the front again to help pay expenses, and to make a liberal contribution to the Campaign Fund of the American Secular Union. And there will be more recruits to join us this fall, and superstition will shrink back worse appalled than she was one year ago. We also want lecturers in the day-time, and desire to make this a three days' camp-meeting, and hereby giv notice to any Liberal lecturer who expects to be traveling East or West about that time, and who could giv us a few lectures on low terms, that he should write to me at once and make an engagement. The meeting may possibly be put three days later, and occupy the first three days of October.

Of all the above I am guilty, and much more; and now, hoping that if there are any more Liberal Becks on the planet, they may boldly come to the front through your paper, I shall close, lest you consign this production to that basket from whose waste no manuscript returns.

J. F. BECK.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., July 31, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Send me 50 or 100 of your last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER (Aug. 1).

There are two tents here this summer besides the Salvation Army, working in the interests of Christianity with "temperance" added, and what we need here is some such article as Mr. Peck's, as well as your answers to the "Seven Questions," to set the young thinking and get their minds interested on both sides of the subject. There are a few who claim to hav been habitual drunkards, and by the help of Jesus their appetite is all taken away. Others in their testimony rather giv this assertion away by saying that the sight of liquor or wine in bottles revives the desire and they hav to avoid the temptation.

With the drunkard I do not care to argue. If he can liv free from drink, I am glad to see him do it. But he must exercise his will power and judgment (I do not see how he can avoid it) precisely the same as I do when I get off the railroad track when the train is approaching. I can understand that a boy is not likely to steal while he knows some one is watching him, and I think the help a drunkard gets is something of this kind. There are three antidotes preached here for drunkenness or drunkards: Jesus, moral suasion, and Prohibition. If Jesus was a sure remedy, the other two would be needless. Jesus has been tried pretty liberally here since Mr. Burdick commenced the temperance movement last fall; and out of those who hav tried this remedy about one in fifty has remained temperate to this time, and as time passes the power of Jesus lessens.

Then we hav the testimony of young converts to Christianity, who hav never read the Bible to speak of, and who could not tell whether Moses was before or after David. So they are not converts through their reason or after a careful investigation of the Bible for and against. The extent of their knowledge is simply a belief in a God and devil, a hell and a heaven. Their guide in life so far has been to please their senses, and by some accident in their experience, coupled with the extent of their knowledge, they are led to believe they hav been serving the devil, and prefer an allegiance to the other side of deity. Hence they claim they hav given their heart to Jesus, and are guided by him. But, to look at it philosophically, we cannot understand how there can be any knowledge conveyed to the human mind without some physical demonstration which the senses can recognize, as it is represented Paul had. We cannot exercise powers we do not possess, and we certainly hav not the power to obtain knowledge outside of our physical senses. We can exercise our imagination, but we cannot depend on it unless we hav experience. I imagin an apple has seeds in it; I do not see them, but I hav had experience with other apples. I imagin I can dig a round hole in the water; experience, through my senses, teaches me I cannot. Mr. Peck's consideration of the historical and miraculous evidence of the New Testament is good, and I hope he will also hav something to say about the philosophy Jesus taught. In the Sermon on the Mount there are different doctrins taught in one sermon: Encouraging the thief, the golden rule, and a prophecy that nothing should fail from the law until all would be fulfilled, etc., while about one of the first things his disciples did after his death was to strike out circumcision as unnecessary. The parable of the sower is not a correct comparison; seed is compared to truth, and the soil to the human mind. Seed grows; truth does not. The soil does not grow, while the capacity of the human mind does. The sower of seed can empty his sack, while a person teaching truth does not lessen his own knowledge; besides, we cannot carry the truth itself, only a knowledge of it. I cannot carry Niagara Falls, only a knowledge of them in the mind; and the only way that knowledge can be taken from the mind is by forgetfulness; as, when it is shown that all the astronomical phenomena that take place can be accounted for only by the earth being round, then I lose the belief that the earth is flat. No devil about it. There is also substantial evidence that no son of God ever told such a parable as the parable of the tares and wheat. There may be defectiv plants in wheat, and also defectiv persons, but a tare as a plant may be as perfect as the wheat; therefore a tare does not represent the imperfect persons. Then the wicked are to be separated from the righteous and be burned. The wicked are those who hav not always done right, and the righteous are those who hav. The human family hav been born into the world in total ignorance, and hav had to learn right and wrong by experience. No individual but that has done some acts right and some wrong. How are the human family to be divided on a question of right and wrong? No son of God ever wrote that parable.

Then, again, all things are possible with God. There must be a line somewhere between the possible and impossible, or God must be terribly mixed. If God created the world, etc., then it is impossible that he did not do it. He must be either moral or immoral, local or everywhere, and we cannot understand how he can be both.

Tracts or papers showing the inconsistencies and also the philosophy on these points, with advertisments of Freethought books, ought to be distributed here freely.

D. SIZER.

DETROIT, MICH., Aug. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 8, 1879, our good radical friend, Seward Mitchell, has a long article on "Hard Times, the Cause and Cure," in which he declares that the great curse and cause of all the evils in this world is money, and that it has done more to demoralize the people than all things else. There is hardly a crime committed but can be traced to money. Our national and every state legislature," he continues, "hav become gigantic rings as corrupt as men can be, and to what other cause but money can it be traced?" Again, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, May 29, 1886, he givs us an article covering nearly a page, headed, "The Evils of Law and Money," in which, after enumerating a large number of evils, crimes, and vices of different lands, "by law," he asks a few questions for those who fire off paper-wads in THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, how long could those "dens of thieves" in Wall street, New York, or the thousands of other gamblers all over the world, carry on their legalized robbery if it were not for money? Let me answer friend Mitchell that he should turn his cart round and say that all these evils are caused by first depriving society of money to do business with, so that in their deprivation people are compelled to do all manner of evils to get that which is represented as a substitute to be the best money the world ever saw, and just enough of the substitute is allowed to go into circulation to serve as bait, as an angler puts bait on a fish-hook. Mr. Mitchell has not the least conception of the real duty and function of money. Bankers' debts are not money, neither is anything that issues from a bank money. Money is the most important factor in civilization; it is the vitalizing influence of industry, the very fiber of social organizatiou, the protoplasm of civilization, and just as essential to the existence of civilization and society as oxygen is to animal life. So say the United States monetary commission, appointed by Congress, and composed of men as intelligent as any others, after due study and examination of the best sources of information. Now if this is the true definition of money, then it is equally true that every government should issue an absolute free legal tender money in unlimited quantities absolutely unrestricted and uncontroled by any other power, so that no man should need to owe one cent, nor any man be able to lend a dollar for use within the full limits of the nation's boundary. The United States monetary commission further declare that the depriving society of (or contraction of) the amount of money in circulation has caused more misery than war, pestilence, and famin (just study that, Brother Mitchell), and more injustice than all the bad laws that were ever enacted (study these few, the greatest truths, the most important declarations that were ever made). It is easy to see from these facts where is the cause of evil. It is not by money, nor the love of money, but from privation, from dire want of that which is as essential to civilization and society as oxygen is to animal life. From these facts it is easy to see that wherever civilization exists, there will exist also the same want, the same deprivation of industry of its vitalizing influence, for the benefit of those who may issue a substitute, and so rob industry of its life; society deprived of its very fiber, civilization of its first seed, its protoplasm. Who can wonder at the chaotic failures that civilization has made in the past? In what age of history has the usurer been absent, or ever society been supplied with anything but a very limited and partial substitute for money, that was necessary to civilization and society even as oxygen to animal life? What wonder that war, pestilence, and famin hav always walked with civilization and society just on the other hand from the usurer (debt-lender), who has always been allowed to deprive industry of its vitalizing influence and force society to buy their debts as a substitute? If society were freely supplied with real money, no man would rob, lie, or steal to get it; no man would spend his time gambling for that of which any and every man could get all that he needed and when he needed. It is absolutely true that all and every crime can be traced to the obtaining of money, or that which will answer as a substitute. But the real object always is what the money will buy, showing that it is privation that drives the robber as certain as that it does the starving beggar. Mr. Mitchell says: "As I walked through the cities, and saw the thousands of signs on the stores, I asked myself, How do these millions of non-producers liv? They do no work, yet they wear the best clothes and liv in the best houses." And he finds but one solution, and that is money. Now, it would be a mystery, indeed, if that which is as essential to civilization and society as oxygen is to animal life should be the cause of all evil. He says all over the land we hear the cry of "hard times," strikes, and distress everywhere, and the people are, with but few exceptions, profoundly ignorant of the true cause.

Yes, Mr. Mitchell, the exceptions are very few, and do not include Mr. M. The chain that binds them is not of gold, but of debt. It is estimated by the secretary of the treasury (some years ago) that the aggregate of the national debts of the world amounts to fifty billions of dollars, and that the private and corporate debts amount to seven times as much, which makes four hundred thousand millions of dollars of debt drawing interest from labor; and these debts are held by the Rothschilds, Barings, and other usurers in the large cities of the world, and the rest of mankind are simply their slaves, and upon the the vast sum of these debts rest all of the evils, war, slavery, vice, crime, misery, the gallows, the prison, jail, workhouse, and, the curse of all others, the police-station, the money-lenders' barrack for their standing army, that has been organized and recruited, and stationed in every city and village since that damnable robbery of 1865, the destruction of eighteen hundred millions of the people's real money, thereby creating thirty-six hundred millions of debts at once.

Mr. Mitchell speaks of the sad sight of thousands of poor prostitutes in every city, and asks, how could they exist if it were not for money? Again, I say, he always gets his cart before his horse. Scarcely one woman in a million ever has much money in such a life. But for the need, the want of that which money will help them to obtain—food, clothing, shelter, a place to sleep in, not liv—for things that, if civilization and society were not deprived of "money," would be always easily obtainable in abundance—for these things poor women and girls walk the streets day and night, offering all that the robbers of civilization hav left them for sale. The want of money is the cause of all evil. The debt-lenders in the large cities can drive mankind all over the earth seeking a home, and their agents, the bankers and pawnbrokers, follow, as the vampires follow the armies, seeking the blood of industry wherever it makes a resting-place. The true remedy is not in destroying money, but in making money, like air, free within the limits of the country, absolutely free, and unlimited, and uncontroled by any person or power. Then all law becomes useless. We should very soon hav scarcely any rich people, for the reason that, there being plenty for all, the incentiv to accumulate would die out, and we should soon hav no use for police or lawyer, or for armies. That great order, the Knights of Labor, hav formulated twenty-two demands to Congress. All of them but two are useless, but the fourteenth and fifteenth are the true remedy for all evil as far as they go; they strike at the true, real cause of all evil. The other twenty demands relate only to effects, not to cause. When the one universal cause is removed, the effects will soon disappear. The Liberals hav Nine Demands, which, like the twenty of the Knights of Labor, are for the removal of nine effects of the deprivation of civilization and society of that which is as essential to their existence as oxygen is to animal life. If we can all see this great truth, and unite on the remedy, the fourteenth and fifteenth demand of the Knights of Labor, there is hope for our Israel.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Boy's Pocket.

If your boy is bright and clever,
And, moreover, you hav never
Chanced to fish that urchin's pocket
('Tis his own word please excuse it,
But so apt I think I'll use it).
At its contents you would wonder;
Nothing on the earth, or under,
Nothing he can grasp above her,
But you're likely to discover
In that mystery of measure,
That receptacle of treasure
Called a boy's trousers pocket.
Here's a sample of the mixture:
Rusty nails, a missing locket,
Headless doll, arms out of socket,
Pieces of a curtain fixture,
Handkerchiefs, my stars! how many,
'Tisn't strange he hadn't any,
Mitten that he lost last last winter,
Paper that would stock a printer,
Jackknife, broken blade, and handle,
Dried-up doughnut, piece of candle,
Tar and spruce gum mixed together,
Ship, dismasted, seen rough weather,
Spools of No. 40 cotton,
Used for rigging, snarled and rotten,
Tops and marbles without number,
Ball of yarn, a piece of lumber,
Pencils of all lengths and sizes,
There's no limit to surprises,
Here's my gold one, I remember
That I lent him last September,
Soldiers used in mimic battle,
Old tin whistle, baby's rattle,
Fish-hooks, careful, you'll be wishing
That you hadn't gone a-fishing,
Fire-crackers, Land of Goshen!
What has hindered an explosion?
Friction matches, some good fairy
Shields this young incendiary,
Strings of cotton, hemp, and leather,
Strings for all things he can tether,
Stick of Fourth of July rocket,
There! We'll stop enumeration,
But it does beat all creation;
And we can but question whether
All this trumpery and treasure
Ever again in fullest measure
Can be crowded, crammed, and knotted
In the little space allotted
To a boy's trouser pocket. M. A. P.

The Best Prayer.

Ella White and George and May Wilson were schoolmates who lived in a lovely village in the state of Ohio.

Ella was the daughter of very devout Christian parents, and was ten years old at the time I write. Her parents were an honest couple, but were more or less biased and led by their minister.

On the contrary, George's and May's parents were outspoken Freethinkers. May was the same age as Ella, while George was two years older.

It was a lovely Saturday in the latter part of September, and, as it was a holiday, the children proposed to go to the woods and gather chestnuts. This was readily assented to, and they each ran off home to get their mothers' consent.

Ella went to Mrs. Wilson's house, where they were to start from. Mrs. Wilson prepared a dainty lunch for the three children. Ella's mother did not hav time to put up a lunch up for Ella, as she expected the minister to tea, and she was very busy fixing the house in grand order on account of his visit.

The three children started off in high spirits, and were soon in the woods. Here they sat down on a large stone, took out their lunch, and began to eat.

After they had finished, they proceeded to gather chestnuts, and, as they were ripe and plentiful, they had no trouble to fill their baskets.

Then they wandered off in search of autumn leaves, far into the backwoods. They wandered here and there, picking up a leaf every now and then of bright color and rare beauty.

But they had roamed farther than they intended, and dark clouds seemed to obscure the sun from their eyes. A distant peal of thunder startled them. Darker and darker grew the sky, and the wind blew fiercely against the trees of the old forest.

Suddenly a terrible crash of thunder, a flash of lightning, and the tree beneath which they stood seemed as if it would fall every moment.

"Quick!" cried George, "let us try and find shelter. There must be some place near here that is better than this."

Ella at once fell on her keees and began to pray. Meanwhile George and May started off, after calling in vain for Ella to follow; but she paid no attention. I suppose she was waiting for the Lord to answer her prayer, and make the storm subside. But it seems God didn't, or he might hav been taking a nap, for the storm didn't stop for two hours.

But to come back to George and May. They started off and came to an old shed just in time to see the rain pour down in torrents. They felt badly to think that they had to leave Ella praying, but they couldn't help it.

After the storm had passed they went back to where they had left Ella, but could not find her.

Poor Ella was left all alone in the woods during that dreadful storm! None the worse for it only that her new dress and hat were all ruined, and she was in danger of taking cold. She presented a very forlorn sight when she came home that night. Perhaps she was a little wiser than in the morning, being convinced that her own energy was the best prayer in case of emergency.

George and May came home as merry as when they had left.

That evening Mrs. White went to call on a neighbor after she had put Ella to bed.

George and May, anxious to see how their playmate had fared, went to see her. They found their little friend in bed all bundled up. After they had told her how they had looked for her, they asked her if it would not hav been much better if she had taken their advice instead of praying. She admitted that they were right, but she wouldn't dare admit the truth to her mother.

When she went to Sunday-school the next Sunday, she told the minister of her experience. He said it was all for the best, but she declared it might be all for the best for the crops, but "I was very foolish," said she, "to think my prayers would allay the storm. I should hav followed my playmates and kept my prayers for less serious occasions."

The parson, seeing himself getting into a tight place in his debate with the little girl, said, "Well, we'll discuss the matter another time."

The next Sunday, when Ella was in Sunday-school, the minister came up and said, "Well, how do you do, my little girl?"

"Oh, I'm quite well, thank you," she replied, "but I hav not quite recovered from the effects of that storm; and every day I begin to think myself more foolish for stopping to pray God to stop the rain; for as I pass along the meadow I see the grass, the trees, and the flowers, which all needed the rain very much, and I think it was silly in me to ask God to prevent the rain from falling."

"Oh, never mind, my child; don't worry yourself about that any more," replied the minister; "are you going on the excursion next week?"

"Well, really, I don't know; I havn't asked mamma yet, but I will ask her to-day."

"All right then, and you'll try and sell these tickets won't you?" said the minister as he handed her a package.

"Yes," replied Ella, and she went home. As she was walking along she espied May coming toward her.

"Well, Ella," asked May, "were you at Sunday-school to-day?"

"Yes," replied Ella.

"And how much better do you feel than if you had stayed away?" inquired May.

"I don't know," replied Ella. "Why do you ask me that question, May?"

"Oh, I hav no particular reason, only I thought I would ask you it. But, really, Ella, do you think Sunday-school does you any good?"

"I guess so; it teaches me to be good, I suppose."

"You ain't sure, are you, though?"

"Well, it doesn't do me any harm, anyhow."

"How about the day of the storm, Ella—did it do you any particular good then?"

"No, I don't know as it did," replied Ella. "I guess it did me more harm on that occasion than good, for I hav always been taught in Sunday-school to pray when there is any danger, and that's why I got wet."

They talked for quite a while, and then they parted.

At last the day for the excursion arrived, and, to make a long story short, it was a most disagreeable day, for the sky was murky and a drizzling rain was falling.

About half-past eight, two or three dozen children stood outside of the church gate waiting patiently for the minister to come, for they did not know whether to get ready to go on the excursion or not.

At last the parson and the deacon were seen walking leisurely toward the church. The children ran up to the minister and asked him if they were to go on the excursion in this disagreeable weather. He said they knew as much about it as he, and that it was a sad state of affairs. And he did not see why providence did not grant them a better day. At last he said that the excursion would be postponed until the next fair day.

When May saw Ella that day, she asked her, if God had any more regard for church folks than anybody else, why did he not giv them a pleasant day for their excursion.

Ella could not answer this question, but May told her to study it out.

The excursion came off the next day, and had quite a nice time. Still May's words haunted her, and she did study them with good results.

Her mind had been turning toward Freethought ever since the day she was disappointed in not having her prayers answered, and it has been turning quite rapidly ever since, and now I think she is one of the most outspoken Freethinkers in the state of Ohio, and too sensible to pray in a rain-storm, or at any other time, believing that good common sense is better in an emergency than any prayer can possibly be.

NEBRASKA, July 27, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought, as the day was fine, I would write you a few lines. I hav so much to tell you that I expect I will discourage you. I am sick to-day, and while I was looking at THE TRUTH SEEKER I saw some of the letters and thought I would write a few lines. I had almost forgotten about it. My sister is away from home and I hav all the work to do for her. Papa and ma are going up to Greenwood next Sunday to hear Mr. Remsburg speak. I shall hav a good time. I attend Sunday-school every Sunday, and I like it very much. I would go to hear Mr. Remsburg speak, but it would be against the laws of the school. I got a pledge in my Sunday-school paper last Sunday. I hav a book and five papers. Papa is cutting oats to-day. He says that he would not take a hundred dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER and a thousand for the pictures. I expect I hav made you mad with my foolishness now, so I will quit for this time. Good-bye, Miss Wixon. Yours truly, EDITH SOWERS.

MCMINNVILLE, OREGON, July 20, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been some time since I hav written you a letter, and seeing so few correspondents, I will try and write again. I enjoy reading the Corner very much. If I was only a little older I think I would be tempted to try and write an essay for the prize. Sometime ago I started in to read the Bible, but I got so disgusted I quit before I finished the second book. After the Lord promising the children of Israel that they might reach the promised land where the rivers flowed with milk and honey, and then after keeping them in the wilderness forty years, allowing only two to reach that glorious land, I made up my mind that if there was a God he must hav been awful hard-hearted and very different from the kind, loving, and true God that the good Christians tell about. For my part I would much rather read THE TRUTH SEEKER than the Bible. Hoping success to Miss Wixon and the cause, I will close, remaining

Your friend, NETTIE A. OLDS.

[Nettie has sensible ideas regarding Bible reading. THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers will do her more good.—ED. C. C.]

July 26, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a reader of the good and Liberal paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read the Children's Corner, and I think it is splendid.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is surely doing a great deal of good, and spreading Infidelity over the United States. I think the pictures on the front and back pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER are nice and instructiv. I liv on a farm in the northern part of Illinois, in Rock Island county. I go to school when we hav school, and am in the fifth grade. I am twelve years old. I hav one sister and three brothers. I solved two puzzles in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 17th, of which I will send the answers with my letter. I will close now, as this is my first letter, and I do not want to write too much the first time. If this is fit to print I would like to see it in the next paper.

Yours respectfully, FLORENCE MOORE.

THE RISE OF

INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Mottoes for Freethinkers

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Poetry.

A Death Song.

Dr. W. A. Barry died May 24th, at Jonestown, Pa. He served as surgeon in the late war, and was with General Sheridan in his famous ride to the front. A delegation of twelve physicians and insurance men accompanied the remains to Reading, Pa., where the interment took place May 27th. The only service was the reading of the following poem, written by John L. Stoddard, and by Dr. Barry's request read at the grave:

When o'er my cold and lifeless clay
The parting words of love are said,
And friends and kindred meet to pay
Their last fond tribute to the dead,
Let no stern priest, with solemn drone,
A funeral liturgy intone,
Whose creed is foreign to my own.

Let not a word be whispered there
In pity for my unbelief,
Or sorrow that I could not share
The view that gave their souls relief.
My faith to me is no less dear—
No less convincing and sincere
Than theirs, so rigid and austere.

Let no stale words of church-born song
Float out upon the silent air,
To prove by implication wrong
The soul of him then lying there.
Why should such words be glibly sung
O'er one when from his living tongue
Such empty phrases never rung?

But, rather, let the faithful few
Whose hearts are knit so close to mine,
That they with time the dearer grew,
Assemble at the day's decline;
And while the golden sunbeams fall
In floods of light upon my pall,
Let them in softened tones recall

Some tender memory of the dead—
Some virtuous act, some words of power,
Which I, perchance, hav done or said,
By loved ones treasured to that hour;
Recount the deeds which I admired,
The motiv which my soul inspired,
The hope by which my heart was fired.

Adami and Heva.

A REPLY TO WM. EMMETTE COLEMAN'S CRITICISM OF MY LETTER ON S. P. PUTNAM'S POEM BEARING THE ABOVE TITLE.

II.

That the story of Adam and Eve is not original with the Hebrews, we hav only to call in the testimony of all oriental archeologists, from the immediate successors of Champollion down to our own George Smith, to prove. These men, if I mistake not, without exception declare that it is a Southern story; that it had its rise in Southern India. That brilliant and careful scientist, Haeckel, basing his plummet on the findings of his brother scientists, in his map showing the distribution of races, makes the Island of Ceylon the paradise, or central point of distribution. When I stated in my letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER that the "fiction" was plagiarized and corrupted by the Hebrew writers, I had two distinct features of the Genesis story in view. That it was plagiarized—that is, not original with the Hebrews, taking the Bible history of the territory they always inhabited as being true—I think I can prove without much difficulty. I will first call in the testimony of Aristotle, backed up by the learning of Josephus. Josephus says in his argument against Apion, quoting from Clearchus, the pupil of Aristotle, that Aristotle said to his pupils: "These Jews are derived from the Indian philosophers. They are named by the Indians, Calimi; by the Syrians, Sudœi; and take their name from the country they inhabit, which is Judea." Don't you think that Aristotle was a much greater philologist and antiquary than anyone living at the present day? He went through the greater part of India at a time and under circumstances which gave him great opportunities to investigate and compare the laws and traditions of the various nations of Asia Minor, India, and Egypt. When I stated that the Hebrew priests corrupted the old story, my meaning was that they changed that feature of it which says that Adima left his terrestrial paradise of his own free will, not that he was driven from it. That this is the oldest of oriental myths is proved from the fact that nearly all the old legends are patterned after it. Take even the somewhat mythical history of Buddha. Is he not surrounded with everything that is to be desired—everything that can please the eye, the ear, the intellect and imagination? Yet, like Adima of old, he leaves his paradise, and seeks more liberty and greater responsibilities, even though sorrow and continual labors beset his pathway. In fact, like Adima, he becomes an explorer. It will not do for one to be too fastidious about any particular name, as I hav tried to show in another part of this article. As Shakspere says, "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." And if one philologist can conscientiously translate a name or term into French or English from the Sanscrit, and call that Adima which another calls Satravatra, Swayambhuva, or Menu, why is he not as near right as the other, particularly when he givs us the most logical reason for doing so? The mere fact of the word Adam meaning earth-born is not more important than that the wife of Menu was born of buttermilk. In the category of names there is none that is so important to our branch of the human family as Menu, yet by a careful tracing of the word to its origin, we would be inclined to say that it meant moon-born.

To this we might say with a good deal of propriety that the words "man," "men," and "mankind" are derived from the Egyptian name of the moon, Meen or Men. Although Sanchoniathon, according to Philo Biblicus, tells us that Hipsiotos, who dwelt near Buibel, Byblos, in Phœnicia with his wife Berouth, begat a son named Adam, because he was formed out of the earth, yet I do not believe, notwithstanding this apparent support of the signification of the name used to denote the first of living beings, that the word was originally intended to be applied to any human being only so far as to satisfy the curiosity of the ignorant. Mr. Coleman claims that the word "Adam" is derived from "Adamah," which means earth-born. But some contend that it is derived from, or rather that it is a corruption of, "Ad-ham." This would somewhat change the signification. "Ad-ham" literally rendered signifies the lord, the everlasting fire, that is, the sun. Now, this brings me to my last reference to some of the wild statements of the writer of the article under consideration. Hear what he has to say about Dr. Milton Woolley: "A certain Dr. Milton Woolley, a Freethinking 'crank,' who published a bulky volume to prove that the entire Bible is unhistorical, and is from beginning to end a symbolical narrativ of astronomical and meteorological phenomena—one of the most absurd works ever published." Now, I hav never read Dr. Woolley's book nor any of the other books he mentions as written by antichristians, yet from the title of Dr. Woolley's work I am not afraid to say that there is a probability that the book contains much that is true. The science of astronomy captured my attention very early in life. I lost no opportunity for many years to gain all the knowledge I could on the subject. In my perusal of the Greek and Roman classics, and the history of astronomy by various authors, I obtained considerable knowledge of heathen mythology and astrology, and I was prepared at once on receiving my first hint on the subject from Bryant's researches in Egypt to begin an investigation of the symbolic theory. From such information as I hav received on this subject, I hav been led to believe that the whole visible heavens were first mapped out into constellation representing or bearing the names of animals. Afterward certain parts of the heavens were called deserts, gardens, and seas. Finally men and women were constellated, and the changing of the names of many of these constellations and stars gave rise to certain fictions, among which is the Chaldaic version of the story of Adam and Eve. This is the proper place, I think, to confess that I made a mistake when I stated in my letter on Mr. Putnam's poem that the Hebrews corrupted the old Asiatic fiction of Adima and Heva. I now believe, after mature consideration, that the book of Genesis contains the story just as it was written by the Chaldean myth-makers and learned by the Hebrew priests during their seventy years' captivity.

If this story was communicated orally to a Hebrew priest, without a proper explanation being given of its various parts, the Hebrews would hav been as much in the dark as Moses was when the light went out. But as Ezra tells us that Moses was versed in all the mysterious knowledge of the Egyptians, I take it that Ezra was instructed in the various styles of Egyptian writing, so that, in reading the Chaldean sacred books, he was able to understand the meaning by the characters employed by the writer. The foundation for the original story of Adam and Eve carries us back to the time when the separate religious systems of sun and moon worship were blended into one system, brought about by an act of confederation and amalgamation of northern and southern nations in India. This amalgamation in time produced a bold, energetic, and adventurous civilization, which eventually resulted in expeditions and emigration to various parts of the world. Then arose the emblematic fiction of the marriage of the sun and the moon, the gods of both peoples. This story was applied literally to the unknown progenitors of the human race, and the astrologers constellated them in the due course of time in that part of the heavens where the constellation of Gemini is now situated. Yes, this constellation commemorates the marriage of the twins. Their habitation was the Garden of the Gods, on the Island of Ceylon. But you will notice that this Adam was not turned out of Paradise, but, like the bad boy who climbs the back fence to get out on the street contrary to parental command, he wades across the channel at low tide on a voyage of discovery.

But the gods of India did not punish his breach of law by a withering curse. No, the offense was condoned, and the culprit rewarded with inexpressible conjugal happiness. The object of this fiction was to reconcile the adherents of two different religious systems to a new one that embraced what was supposed to be best in both. And as Adima is represented as of an adventurous spirit, the fiction in this regard had an inspiring effect on the healthy and vigorous for a long time. As the legend relates that Heva fled, and was pursued by Adima, that was in accordance with a part of the then marriage ceremony, a custom transmitted from primitiv society. The Hebrew or Chaldean story is a mixture of allegory, knowledge, and supposed knowledge of nature. In this legend the sun represents the male or positiv principle in nature, and the moon the female or negativ principle. I will now giv a brief explanation of some of the leading points in the opening chapter of Genesis. "And the Lord said, Let there be light, and there was light."

Primitiv men beheld the sun and moon giving light. They also saw the aurora of the north at night, and the tropical light at morning and evening. They supposed these lights were independent of sun and moon. Therefore as light existed which did not seem to proceed from either sun or moon, it was supposed to be older than either, so it was put first. I will not trespass on your space by enumerating the significance to be attached to the work of creation as embraced in the six days' labor of the Lord. Suffice it to say that it represents the sun passing from the lone night of winter to its entry of the first sign of the zodiac when its apparent return to the northern hemisphere begins. Each sign of the zodiac stands for a day. As half of the first day ended before the sun entered the sign we now call Capricornus, so the first day ended in the middle of that sign or constellation.

On the fourth day the sun had reached the center of the sign Aries. The sun has now crossed the equator on the northern hemisphere, is so situated that the largest part of the stellar universe could be seen by the Chaldean star-gazers. The sun has made his debut above the equator, and spring has opened. The moon also has returned from her northern trip, and is traveling, apparently, in the sun's track. The sun now begins to act on vegetation. It was supposed also that the moon and stars had considerable influence in that direction. The sun, moon, and stars are now the undisputed sovereigns of day and night, therefore they are said to be made on the fourth day. On the sixth day the sun is in the sign or constellation of Gemini, the Twins, Adam and Eve. The celestial and terrestrial paradises are now open to the beholder. The earth is clothed with vegetation; the air is fragrant with the perfume of flower, fruit, expanding stem, and waving foliage of every variety. Gold and silver lined clouds bank the western sky as the sun descends behind the mountain peaks. Evening twilight comes, and the reflection of the sun's rays, off the mighty ocean, mantles the celestial paradise with a quivering fan of changeful hue. The scene changes. A new act begins. We are now told how Adam and Eve, that is, the sun and moon, are made. In the language of the Chaldaic seer, the sun assumes the quality or signification of the name of the constellation it enters. The next sign or constellation is now called Cancer, it was formerly called the Asses. As the Chaldaic name for the Ass may be translated muddiness, we can plainly see how Adam, the sun, was made of the slime of the earth. But how is Eve made—Eve, the moon? Adam, the sun, has gone to sleep. It is night, of course, and he has sunk to rest far below the western horizon. Then Eve, the moon, appears rising in the east, made from a rib taken from the side of Adam. That is, the moon appears, while the sun is figurativly asleep, whose light is made of a ray from the side of the sun. The sun has now reached his highest altitude in the northern heavens. The seventh day has come, and the work of creation is at an end. He now rests, and this is the Sabbath of the lord of the earth, the sun. If the geographical limits of the constellations of the zodiac hav not been changed, and I do not think they hav, this version of the Adam and Eve story cannot be much over twenty-three hundred years old. Therefore I do not think that Colonel Ingersoll was much out of the way in his assignment of the age of the Indian legend of Adima and Heva, or Iva.

is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove. He has for twenty years treated exclusivly all diseases of the Sexual Organs, in the cures of which he stands preeminent SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., are cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. NO STOMACH MEDICIN USED. It is one of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. It is not a catch-penny get up, such as a pad, belt, pastille, nor magnetic appliance, but simply a medicin to be applied externally on the parts affected, which cures by absorption. "SHOPPEL'S MODERN HOUSES" No. 3.
(Just Published, July 1, 1886) CONTAINS:

A colored frontispiece showing the modern style of painting.

A cardboard supplement, ingeniously drawn and colored, to supply all the neccessary pieces for constructing a model house, with plain directions for putting them together.

While the supplement affords both old and young the greatest amusement, it is more than a toy. It is, in fact, a most practical lesson in Architecture; a perfect, scaled model of one of our most popular designs, so exact that it is useful to builders.

55 New Designs for Residences (cost varying from $500 to $15,000).
2 New Designs for Barns.
1 New Design for a Chapel.
Drawings and description of a model Kitchen (by Maria Parloa) and a perfect Cistern.
An Article on Villa Park Associations.

OF THE

NEW YORK STATE

FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION,

TO BE HELD AT

White Sulphur Springs Park, Saratoga Co., New York.

From Thursday, Sept. 2d, to Sunday, Sept. 12th, 1886.

Reduction on all railroad routes. Special excursion rates to Saratoga from all points.

The best Liberal speakers will be in attendance. List of speakers and subjects given next week.

Splendid facilities are afforded for boating, bathing, fishing, driving; magnificent scenery. The best dancing pavilion in the state. Fine band. Everything necessary to an enjoyable occasion. All the advantages of a visit to Saratoga will be afforded visitors, thus combining the attractions of that popular watering-place with those of the convention.

Season tickets, admitting the bearer to all lectures, $1.00. First-class board, $1.00 per day. (It will greatly facilitate matters if orders for season tickets with remittance accompany applications for rooms.) Applications for tickets and rooms should be addressed to C. B. Reynolds, 33 Clinton Place, New York. Contributions, necessary to defray preliminary expenses, may be sent to the treasurer, E. M. Macdonald.

ed the authority of the church, and Rousseau prepared the way for the destruction of the crown. He believed in a dreamland of the past, which had never existed; he appealed to imaginary laws of nature. Yet these errors were beneficial in their day. He taught men to yearn for an ideal state, which they with their own efforts might attain; he inspired them with the sentiment of liberty and a reverence of the law of right. Virtuous principles, abstract ideas, the future deities of men were now, for the first time, lifted up to be adored. A thousand hearts palpitated with excitement; a thousand pens were drawn; the people that slumbered in sorrow and captivity heard a voice bidding them arise; they strained, they struggled, and they burst their bonds. Jacques Bonhomme, who had hitherto gone on all fours, discovered to his surprise that he also was a biped, the world became more light, the horizon widened, a new epoch opened for the human race. —Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

To turn away from the stony temples and petrified doctrins of supernaturalism, and read Bacon understandingly, and know Kant, and walk hand in hand with Spencer, is like coming out of some Druidical grove of sacrifice into the pure air and lightsome day, for which we were made.—Water's Through Rome On.

But, besides, a man had rather hav a hundred lies told of him than one truth which he does not wish should be told." Goldsmith: "For my part I'd tell truth and shame the devil." Goldsmith: "His claws can do you no harm when you hav the shield of truth."—Boswell's Life of Dr. Johnson.

OLD David Hope lived on a little farm close to Solwayshore, a mile or two east of Annan, a wet country, with late harvests, which are sometimes incredibly difficult to save—ten days continuously pouring, then a day, perhaps two days, of drought, part of them, it maybe, of high roaring wind, during which the moments are golden for you, and, perhaps, you had better work all night as presently there will be deluges again. David's stuff, one such morning, was all standing dry, ready to be saved still, if he stood to it, which was very much his intention. Breakfast, wholesome, hasty porridge, was soon over, and next in course came family worship, what they called taking the book, i.e., taking your Bible, psalm and chapter always part of the service. David was putting on his spectacles when somebody rushed in. "Such a raging wind risen will drive the stooks (stacks) into the sea, if let alone." "Wind?" answered David. "Wind canna get ae (one) straw that has been appointed mine. Sit down and let us worship God."—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

To find people who believe their religion as a person believes that fire will burn his hand, when thrust into it, we must seek them in those oriental countries where Europeans do not yet predominate, or in the European world, where it is still universally Catholic.—Mill's Essays on Religion. [NOTE.—Specimens of the type of David Hope still linger, I suppose, in the Hebrides, and, not impossibly, in the God-forsaken state of Delaware, but Mill, educated by an enlightened, though not infallible, father, had no idea that such stone-blindness existed outside of heatheuism or popery. His friend, Carlyle, could hav enlighteued him, but I can well fancy that they would keep clear of talking on such subjects. There would hav been no good.—Hylax.]

I could picture to myself a bright creed truly, but to think that it would be real because it was pretty would be childish indeed.—Charles Butler.

THE WORKINGMAN'S BURDEN.

Notes and Clippings.

An Albany speculator is said to be making a good deal of money by purchasing Canadian silver in New York at 20 per cent discount and circulating it at home at par.

Mrs. Lilla May Pavy, widow of the late Dr. Octave Pavy, naturalist and surgeon of the Greeley Arctic expedition, has given to the National Museum at Washington the relics collected by her husband on his trip to the Arctic region, reserving the right to withdraw them if she desires at any time during her lifetime.

Dr. Peter E. Minor, of Schenectady, thinks he has discovered a gold mine in Fulton, Schoharie county, N. Y. He has a rocky farm there, and in looking for building stone he came upon evidences of gold, which, on examination, indicated a yield of $584 to the ton. He has filed his claim to the mine with the secretary of state.

A physician in Middletown, N. Y., had such success in treating diphtheria that he boasted that he "defied God almighty to produce a case of diphtheria he couldn't cure." Immediately after, his eight children died of that disease, and now the neighborhood claims "a visitation in punishment of defiance of the deity."

In The Truth Seeker of the 14th inst., an account was given of the refusal of Clerk Jarvis, of the Naturalization Bureau, to issue papers to Carl Robitscheck, because of his declination to take the oath. Mr. Robitscheck has since found a friend in the person of Henry Akrep, who, by threatening Clerk Jarvis with legal proceedings, compelled the Naturalization Bureau to accept Mr. Robitscheck's affirmation, as provided in the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The Brooklyn Examiner (Roman Catholic) seems to hav small respect for the ecclesiastical character of the Abbé (and Canon) Liszt. The Examiner says: "At his funeral in Bayreuth there were no religious ceremonies, and his remains were conveyed to the cemetery suggestivly accompanied by the city fire brigade."

A Jersey City scamp married a woman because she had $150 saved. Then he boarded with her brother-in-law until he learned where his wife's folks kept their cash, when he stole his wife's $150 and $100 from her brother, and decamped. The Jersey City police are looking for the man for robbing the brother-in-law, but in New Jersey a man cannot be punished for robbing his wife. New Jersey, as we hav before remarked, is a great state—a little larger than Delaware.

In the past winter, at one of the Salvationist meetings at Canaseraga, when lots of men and women rose up to tell their experience, a little boy got up, thinking that he would not be behind in confession, and in a shrill voice delivered the following short speech, word for word: "I guess Jizzus is bully; I love him more and more; he picked me out of the gutter." The poor little brat probably did not know what whisky and beer were, and was not tall enough to steal apples. The same season, at a Salvationist meeting at Black Creek, in Birdsall, a slim, tall boy rose up, and clearing his throat, with some embarrassment made the following maiden speech: "Brethren, they may call me a crank, or a God-damn fool; I don't care; they may call me what they God-damn please; I am washed in the blood; brethren, pray for me." Being "washed in the blood," that boy must carry around with him the odors of sanctity.

In their dual capacity of Christians and law-expounders judges sometimes take queer positions. In 1821 a judge of this city handed down a decision in a blasphemy case and it has been formulated by a legal "digester" into "law:" "To speak contemptuous words of our savior is not punished as blasphemy where the words were uttered in the course of an intemperate political dispute by one who belonged to a church, and frequented it, and was of good character generally."

In the Chicago Anarchists' trial the prosecution has closed its argument, and the defense is now pleading. Mr. Walker was applauded by the audience when in his speech he referred to Spies's speech at Grand Rapids on Washington's birthday. Mr. Walker said: "Spies compared himself to George Washington. He said: 'There will be a revolution in 1886 when the eight-hour movement reaches its culmination. George Washington led a revolution. If he had failed he would hav been punished; if I fail I will be punished.'"

Messrs. Williams and Mainwaring, Socialistic speakers, were arrested in London for holding an outdoor meeting, the charge being obstructing the streets. The judge fined them $100 each, with the alternativ of two months in jail. Williams and Mainwaring maintain that they had a right to speak where they did, and will not pay the fine. If the authorities put them in prison, the sin will be that of the municipal authorities. The workingmen of London are fast realizing that the police are being used against them, while religious exhorters may use the streets whenever they choose without molestation.

There has been, doubtless, a good deal of twaddle talked on both sides of the questions that arise concerning religious education in our public schools. President Seelye, of Amherst College, goes very near the root of the matter when he asks, in the July Forum, why we should teach the life of Julius Cæsar in our schools and not that of Jesus Christ. And, indeed, why should we?—Advocate. For the very good reason that the life of Cæsar is history; that of Jesus Christ is not. As Miss Gardener would express it, we must discriminate historical facts from theological fictions.

Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, is said to be a firm believer in pure secular government, as enunciated by Washington and Jefferson, and is possessed withal of ample statesmanlike courage to maintain his convictions in any emergency. Mr. Shepherd, of Leavenworth, recently wrote him upon the subject of church encroachment, calling attention particularly to the Comstock bill now in the Senate, and elicited a response from which the following is taken: "The subject is one of very great importance, and requires earnest and careful consideration. I shall endeavor to so act as to protect the liberties of the country against the assaults of its adversaries, whether political or evangelical."

Communications.

Facts About the New Testament.

A full knowledge of the true history of the Christian religion would astonish most Christians. The gospels of the New Testament did not assume a canonical position until the latter part of the second century. No book was called scripture until the year 170. It is wonderful to think how much the Christian has believed and how little he has known.

Now, I want to make an illustration. Suppose a proposition should be made to unite all the churches in one common body, and a great council should be called, and all the churches should send representativs to the council. Would not the Roman Catholic representativs strive with all their power to inject all the Catholic doctrin into the council that it was possible for them to do? Would not the Baptists strive with might and main for their peculiar ideas and dogmas? Would not the Presbyterians and Methodists manifest equal zeal and strive in like manner? In short, would not each church push its claims to the extent of its ability?

This was exactly the case with the councils of the church in which the doctrins and what was to constitute the scriptures of the New Testament were settled. Before these councils the various writings of which I hav spoken were presented. Of course, every partisan was pushing his claim. Every writer was anxious to hav his writings inspired by being adopted by the church councils. Hence these councils were frequently the scenes of hot disputes and bitter quarrels. Each partisan urged his own claim, and in many instances decried the claims of others. Cliques were formed like the political rings of the present day for the purpose of carrying some particular measure. At these councils the divinity of Christ, the miraculous conception, the resurrection, the ascension, the holy trinity, and other doctrins of the church were discussed and voted upon. At these councils selections were made from the various writings which comprise the scriptures of the New Testament, the councils deciding by vote which was the word of God and which was not. Creeds and parts of scripture which were adopted at one council were rejected at another. Some of these councils broke up with kicks and cuffs and broken heads.

A full history of all these councils would lead one to believe that if these Christian writers were inspired from above, the members of some of the councils were inspired from the lower country.

We know very little about the teachings and doings of Christ. Those who wrote about him, like the biographers of Washington, got in a great many hatchet-stories. They wrote what they pleased in the interests of the church, in times when the masses were too ignorant to read, before the art of printing was known; there were very few to call them to account, and the writers who disputed what the Christians had written had their writings either altered or burnt.

There seems to be preponderating evidence that some such man as Christ existed. The time of his birth and death is unknown. Some writers maintain that he died comparativly young, that his ministry lasted only about three years; others assert that it lasted over fifty years. If he was in the ministry over fifty years, of course his birth would hav to be set back before the Christian era, so as to correspond with the difference between three and fifty.

It would appear that Christ was born among the very poor, and that his followers were from the same class, so much so that they were compelled to put what little they possessed into a common fund in order to provide for those who were unable to provide for themselvs.

It seems marvelous that the followers of Christ should be driven to such straits, when the master was the very God, and could feed a vast multitude and hav more provisions left after the feast than they had before. If Christ should appear among the churches to-day as he was when he worked at his trade, making yokes and plows, with his apron on, all dirt and grime, he would be told, as a certain woman was, that "it was not desirable to hav her attend church until she could appear a little more presentable."

But wasn't that a droll kind of business for a God to be engaged in? What do you suppose Barnum would giv for a plow that God made? And oh! what ox-yokes for a new country.

Notwithstanding the fact that Christ was from the poor and lowly, and his followers were from the same class, the latter-day Christian who rents the costliest slip in the church is considered the biggest frog in the pond. He is not only allowed to occupy the highest bog, but does all the loud croaking. This holds good wherever the Christian religion prevails.

It is as impossible for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven as it is for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle, yet everywhere the church bows to wealth, but it puts under the ban all those who do not indorse its superstitions. Are we bearing aloft the torch of reason, or are we as blind as moles, trying to envelop all in darkness?

Is there sin in an honest thought? Is there wickedness in the expression of an opinion? Is there danger that there will be too many thinkers in the world? Would it not be better to encourage honest thinkers than to put them down? It is as wicked to strangle a thought as it would be to strangle a newborn babe.

I believe the Christian religion to be a great delusion, but I would not suppress the thoughts of a Christian by force if I had the power.

Freedom of thought tends toward better conditions, to a higher civilization. The literary world should be like a great fair—the best thoughts should bear away the highest prizes.

Is there any good reason why a man should not be allowed to express his opinion upon any and all systems of religions as well as upon any other subject?

Some of the most valuable books hav been burnt, some of the grandest ideas choked down. It may hav been better for the priestood, but was it better for the world? Hav priests and ministers the right to do the thinking for the rest of mankind? Let thought clash against thought, like two Damascus blades; perhaps a spark of truth may be eliminated. He who strikes for the freedom of thought strikes for the freedom of the world. He who would suppress the freedom of thought deserves to be a slave, and will sooner or later find a master. Freedom of thought is worth more to the world than all the systems of supernatural religions put together.

It would be painful to portray the means which the church has resorted to first and last to suppress the freedom of thought. Humanity must ever weep over imprisoned innocence. Those who hav suffered torture and death at the hands of the church may be counted by thousands.

Every pretense of freedom, while the mind is enslaved, is a sham. Every Christian who attempts to shield his religion by enslaving the mind may be a good Christian, but he will prove a bad republican.

If the Christian can prove that Christ can forgiv sins, it will prove a great bonanza to the Jameses, the Guiteaus, and all who are "roped" into the New Jerusalem. I believe such doctrin to be most pernicious in its influence. "In the good time coming" every man will be a savior. From the time when "I ran in the slippery paths of youth" up to the present time there is much to be forgiven, but I would much rather ask those against whom I hav sinned to forgiv me than to call upon one who died nearly two thousand years ago, and one whom I never had the power to injure.

If the Christian should prove that a snake brought all the sin into the world, it would go hard with that snake if I could find him.

"The principles of good and evil," says Draper, "are in never-ending conflict. The world is their battle-ground, and man is their prize." Snake or no snake, this is true. There is a Persian legend that the evil spirit sent a serpent to ruin the paradise which the good spirit had made. This shows that even the old snake story is of Eastern origin. Friendly reader, please giv me credit for running the old snake of the garden into its original hole; and I would plug up the hole, but what would the Christian's dear savior and plan of redemption amount to without the old snake story?

Professor Draper says: "As a gratification to their pride, the conquering republic brought the gods of the vanquished peoples to Rome. That paramount authority exercised by each divinity in his original seat disappeared at once in the crowd of gods and goddesses among whom he had been brought."

So if the Christian could be brought directly in contact with all the other religious systems of the world, he would begin "to see himself as others see him," and the peculiar sanctity of his own religion would disappear entirely. If the miracles of the New Testament could be brought into fair competition with the miracles of Mohammed, Apollonius, Simon Magus, and other great miracle-workers of the world, they would be so tamed down as to attract neither attention nor comment.

Could the Christian be surrounded with all the saviors who were god-begotten and crucified to atone for the sins of a wicked world, he would see that the gods had shed a great deal of blood first and last to little purpose.

Could he see all the worshipers of the world on bended knees before their respectiv gods and saviors, the consolations of the Christian religion would turn to ashes when it was found that millions of others were deriving the same consolation from other gods and saviors.

Few Christians could be made to believe that a dove came out of a divining rod, and lit upon the head of Joseph, as mentioned in the Protevangelion. But if the book containing this statement had been voted the word of God, every Christian would hav believed it. All the Christian has for his faith to rest upon is the votes of men, and some of them very bad men too. The early fathers referred to this gospel, and it was believed to be genuin by many of the early Christians. Whether true or false, the New Testament was partly made up from it. Oswald says: "The committee of the church council that made the four gospels the canon of their faith had to select them from fifty-four contradictory versions."

If the early writers were inspired, where did these "contradictory versions" come from? One thing is certain: those who made the selection were not inspired, and the Christian ought to see that all he has to depend upon is the reliability of that committee of whom not one Christian in ten thousand knows anything.

A few words to the Liberal reader will close this article. These "Facts About the New Testament," which I hav been a long time gathering up, were mainly written out on my knee in the workshop, a few minutes at a time as I was able to snatch them from my business. If time is permitted, some day I shall giv them a more elaborate finish.

But I am growing old, and life at the best is uncertain, and I thought it might be the means of doing some good to touch the torch of these facts to the brain of some young man, even though it were done in a bungling way.

The facts as stated will be verified by consulting the works of Waite, Draper, Taylor, Mosheim, Paine, and Gibbon. I advise every young Liberal to obtain these works and study them closely; they will serve as a shield while fighting the battle against superstition.

In the days of slavery I was told that the slaves were happy and contented with their lot. I said I would never cease to heap curses upon an institution which was clothed with power to utterly obliterate the last vestige of manhood from the human mind. More than eighteen hundred years the cruelest superstition which the world ever saw has been plowing deep furrows into the human brain, until millions are reft of their manhood, and lie sprawling in the dust at the feet of a bloated priesthood.

And, now, my Liberal young friend, I want to induce you to take up this fight against superstition, and wage a stronger battle than my limited circumstances hav allowed me to do. And I want to say that I ask no higher honor than to hav some young man with talent and courage stand at my grave, and, in the name of humanity, pledge himself to carry on this fight until reason is enthroned, and the last vestige of superstition is drived from our land.

JOHN PECK.

Si Slokum to the Religious Editor.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEPENDENT, Sir: The following you copied from THE TRUTH SEEKER:

I wish I had the gift of gab, I would get onto the revival racket at once. There are thousands, if not millions, in it. —Si Slokum.

This sentiment, you remark, "leaves little room for surprise that scandalously bad people occasionally get into the church."

Now, I wrote these words to show, in the best way, what I thought of your Christian "revivalists," who, to a man, are "on the racket" for money. A set of deadbeats and mountebanks, every one of them is making tenfold more money than he could possibly make otherwise, and you know it. Sam Jones wasn't worth a dollar when he "struck the racket," and Sam Small was over ears in debt when he "got onto it;" they are now both raking in the dollars hand over fist, as the saying is, getting these dollars from poor fools much easier than they ever before got any dollars.

Speaking of bad people that "occasionally get into the church," allow me to say that "occasionally" is good, very good. If I could believe that good people "occasionally get into the church," my opinion of the church would be different from what it is; but I don't believe it, and my opinion of the church is what it is.

I repeat that, were I a Christian (?) possessed of the gift of gab, I would get onto the revival racket without loss of time. No ordinary business that I know of pays as well as this racket, and money is what the Christian (?) is after all the time and every time, and fools pour it into the pockets of the "revivalist," who knows there is no soft thing in life for him equal to the one he is working, and which he works to the extent of his ability. It is a wonder to me that there are not more in the business—observe that I look upon it as a business, an extremely shady one, requiring first-class hypocrisy to conduct successfully, of which Christians (?) alone hav the monopoly—than are now engaged in it. It must be that it requires no little "personal magnetism," a quality or gift that does not largely obtain with mortals, to draw and keep drawing crowds of fools and the dollars from their pockets; otherwise "revivalists" would abound and run the whole business into the ground. What a "revivalist" Jim Blaine would make, eh? Talmage would make a "corker," too. To be sure, he is not so "magnetic" as Jim, but, king of clowns as he is, he would probably draw as well as the "man magnetic" of Maine. But he won't go "on the road," having a softer thing with an established circus of his own where his grotesque contortions, convulsing grimaces, and stage tricks are enjoyed by thousands who are willing to pay well for being amused by the boss theological clown of all Christendom.

The "sentiment" I expressed, in order to show the character of these Doctors of Hypocrisy, is the sentiment that urged them to go into the "revival" business, and the sentiment that causes them to stick to it. Money is what they are after, and the easiest way to get it is the way for them, hence they work the "revival" business, the easiest of all ways of getting money, save Jay Gould's way, which they hav not the brains for, so try the next best and easiest way. It is the sentiment that urges men to join the church and become Chirstians (?). The argument is: I can succeed better if I join the church. I can sell 1,800 pounds of coal for a ton, and never be questioned, because I am a church-member and a Christian (?). I can adulterate my coffees, teas, sugars, and everything that will bear adulteration, and not be suspected, for the ægis of church-membership covereth a multitude of sins from the sight of the world. That's the argument, and he joins the church forthwith and becomes a full-fledged Christian (?). It is the sentiment that rules all you Christians (?), Mr. Independent Editor, and you know it.

Gracious! I should like to look upon some of those "scandalously bad people who occasionally get into the church." They must be the toughest of tough cusses, if they exceed in badness many of your pious pulpiteers in the seduction line, or exalted laymen in the bank-wrecking line, and who rob widows and orphans right and left, and are up to all sorts of rascality, such as is every day being exposed. But as a few drops of sludge acid dropped into a bucket of sewer filth won't make the latter much the worse, so a few "scandalously bad people getting into the church occasionally" won't make the church much the worse, as I look at it. How is it with your vision, Mr. Editor? Perhaps you never looked at it in that light. But I hav no other light; so don't distress yourself with the thought that I might get into the church. I don't want, and wouldn't hav, any of it in mine, and wouldn't touch it with a forty-foot pole. What is the saying about pitch and defilement? Doubtless you can bring it to mind.

Hoping you will be able some day to say that some very good people are "occasionally getting into the church," I remain Yours despairingly,

SI SLOKUM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I send the above to you for publication, doubting very much that the Independent editor would be independent enough to publish it. S. S.

"Superstition in the Labor Movement."

The sensible and witty article of Mr. George Macdonald in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 24th suggests a few remarks. Although "land nationalization" expresses the spirit of Henry George's agitation, you overlook the circuitous method of effecting this which he proposes in "Progress and Poverty," and which is the same now enthusiastically advocated by a New York organ devoted to his apostolate, viz., Spread the Light. Mr. George's panacea against laudlordry. in which he sees the devil and the genesis of all the ills that flesh is heir so, is "to tax land up to its full value," meaning thus to transfer all profits of rent to the government treasury, but his scheme does not suppress private ownership of land, nor does Henry George accept limitation of areas in landed property. Subject to the tax, the soil should, in George's view, be a market commodity, open to speculation.

A devout believer in "concentration" as the practical spirit of our age, and especially in the accumulation of wealth by any other capitalists than landlords, approving usury and commercial profits, Henry George is hand in glove with the political economists. Repudiating coöperation as a remedy for the evils of labor, and aspiring to nothing beyond the wage or hireling system, he would justify by the logical application of his principle, one man or corporation in owning all the soil of the United States, and cultivating it by hired labor, if he only paid his tax assessment. Now, this ought to be less difficult than for a "right whale," the toothless whale that swallows without biting, but whose throat is hardly bigger than an ox's, to swallow Jonah. Mr. George makes it easier by suppressing all taxes on improvements, though here occurs the practical objection that Mr. Macdonald has noted, viz., the difficulty of separating such added values in the assessment, from the soil, of which manures, for example, are integrant, and whose values in all agricultural land are relativ to the soil. The "unearned increment" by rise of value in city lots is the basis of distinct economic problems, and it is plausibly argued by many that this should not be left a prey to speculators. It remains to ask who has the best right to it or the taxes it will bear, the general government or the local municipality from whose civic aggregation the rise in value has resulted. But such niceties do not arrest Mr. George's attention; he is statesman or nothing, and his ideal is the absorption of all other taxes in the land-tax, which alone in its glory is to suffice for all the costs, the expenditures, the extravagances of government. His sanguin disciples expect it to yield, after paying the public debt, a surplus debt, for the purchase of the railroads, and telegraphs next, and the factories afterward, but Mr. George has not, that I am aware, himself avowed state Socialism.

His attention, in "Progress and Poverty," was preoccupied with agricultural affairs. Now remark this: the difference in profits between ordinary farming and the great bonanza farms does not result from a greater yield per acre, but from the application of steam or the dynamo with improved machinery to a great number of acres, with a corresponding reduction in the number of laborers. In agriculture, as in manufacture, the quantity, as compared with handwork, is thus as one hundred to one, and it is computed by the leading proprietor or manager at Glyndon, Dakota, as Edward Atkinson mentions, that one man's labor, already equivalent to a yield of 5,500 bushels of wheat, or the culture of half a section, may, by perfected arrangements, yield twice as much, extending to a 640-acre tract, though of course not separately or isolativly.

In climates where, as in Arkansas and tropicward, two crops a year are obtainable, the number of laborers must be increased, but the highest wages still bear no proportion to the profits. The machinery, the buildings, etc., are improvements that Mr. George would exempt from taxation, which would therefore fall lightly upon the great capitalist of the bonanza farm, but heavily upon the small farmer, without improved machinery or their great motors, and whose property consists mainly in the soil itself. What prevents them from combining their means for the purchase of machinery, and working with it? Only lack of wisdom, wit, and will?

These are serious obstacles, but not all. Of all factors, the most potent are habit and custom. Now, these favor the adjustments of coöperation under capitalist authority as in factories, or governmental authority as in armies and navies; but the working farmer class is accustomed to a system of separativ interests, to the old-fashioned patriarchal family life, only narrower. Nothing short of compulsion or imminent starvation will make farmers coöperate otherwise than with their own hired help, unless under some religious influence, like the Shakers or disciples of Socialist teachers.

Had modern mechanics the thrifty disciplin of the medieval crafts, they would hav owned machinery, instead of letting it pass into the hands of a distinct class of capitalists. To this moral difficulty is added the fact that machinery dispenses with the greater number of the laborers previously employed. Only a small number of our actual farmers could then be activ partners in coöperation with machinery, and if they can get the use of capital they will suffice for the supply of the market.

Henry George objects to coöperation that it benefits only the coöperators, and, his ideas being confined to competition in the market, he cannot see how they are to profit, unless at other folk's expense. This squinting view has a real, although limited, truth. The advocacy of a compulsory eight-hour law, which Mr. Macdonald justly condemns in Henry George, is in glaring inconsistency with his position in "Progress and Poverty," condemning the intervention of government in economics, and trusting to free competition; though, as we hav just shown, competition would not be free and fair under his land-tax between great and small proprietors, but fulfil the Christian axiom, "To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

The eight-hour regulation would result in the employment of relays, or a double set of hands—even a treble or quadruple set in some works—and better qualities of work are done short of fatigue than when fatigued; but to realize the advantages of leisure it is necessary not to be too hungry. Now, if twelve hours' work barely pays enough to liv by, how will capitalists be induced to pay as much for eight hours? Such laws imply the abolition of personal contracts, and finally the monopoly of capital by government, with the vague and pueril supposition that its authoritativ taskmasters will prove more merciful than our actual employers. But look at the Egypt of the Pharaohs and its fellahs. There is your state Socialism cut and dry. Privileged taskmasters, whether appointed or elected, as elections go—will they be more considerate for the laborer, not of their own party, or will the ballot giv the title to employment?

ENGEWORTH.

Bacon vs. Shakspere.

The Shakspereans appear to cling to their idol with the same tenacity that the Christians hold on to their Jesus. The editor of the Chicago Current having made some derisiv remarks about the alleged proof that Shakspere could not write, I addressed him a card in a chipper style, which he not only printed with antagonistic comments, but condescended to write me privately as follows:

You are enlisted in a war on our greatest literary genius. As you know, I, in common with mankind, hav no sympathy with you. Even if I could tolerate the discussion at all I should demand a preliminary state of mind in the investigation that you hav not got. If a man saw he could dethrone Shakspere, he ought to feel unhappy; he should not glory in such work. I giv you my opinions candidly because I expect to do what I can to embarrass even the temporary success of all such adventures as yours.

To this I replied as follows:

You tell me I am "enlisted in a war on our greatest literary genius." How so? Do I make war on Bacon?

You say that you, "in common with mankind," hav no sympathy with me. Tut, tut! How many of mankind hav yet given a thought to the question? And how many care whether Bacon or Shakspere wrote the plays? But already we hav a fine array of Baconians, and the converts are coming in fast.

As for my "preliminary state of mind," it was always receptiv of truth, and in my pamphlet I treat the subject dispassionately. But do you not betray the unreceptiv state of your mind in the expression, "If I could tolerate the discussion at all," and again when you say, "I expect to do what I can to embarass even the temporary success of such adventures as yours?"

You taunt me with glorying in my work, and tell me that if I could dethrone Shakspere I "ought to feel unhappy."

I am indeed sorry to disturb the benighted worshipers of the dumb idol of Avon, but do I not giv them in its place an object worthy of the highest adoration?

But mine is only a little contribution. There cometh after me a mightier one who will prove beyond all cavil that Bacon concealed and yet disclosed his authorship in the folio of 1623 by an incontrovertible cipher.

Our London Letter.

It is gratifying to the Freethought party that Charles Bradlaugh is once more in the field as a lecturer and writer against religious superstition. His political career has hitherto absorbed the greater portion of his time, so much so, indeed, that he had apparently drifted quite away from the pursuit of his earlier days. But now that his parliamentary troubles, with the exception of the appeal yet to be heard before the lords, are well over, he no doubt finds himself more at liberty to resume his attacks on clerical error.

One of his bitterest opponents, Sir Henry Tyler, has, through Bradlaugh's instrumentality, been convicted of infringing the law, and fined for actions that no decent individual would be guilty of; and another of them, Baron de Worms, has just found it necessary to relieve himself of his unfaithful wife. He would much better hav been employed in attending to his domestic affairs than in opposing a properly qualified member of Parliament from taking his seat in the House. It is rather curious that so many of Bradlaugh's opponents hav come to grief one way and another, while those who hav supported him hav been much more fortunate.

There is a big Wesleyan Methodist conference in London just now, and consequently quite a show of long black coats and soft felt hats. It is about the most mixed lot I hav seen for some time; every type of physiognomy is visible. Some of the individuals are very truculent looking, and intelligent faces are the exception. I do not know what they are supposed to be doing—probably organizing some plan for increasing the receipts, which, I understand, are not coming in so freely as might be desired. The beating of the drum ecclesiastic is not so efficacious as it once was, and the parsons hav to put on more power to enable them to cover the expenditure and keep all the churches going.

The vicar of a church in Lambeth has been greatly upset by a proposition brought before the vestry condemning the system of burial fees, and has written a letter in which he offers to bury the vestryman who made the motion, free of cost, stating that "as a Christian minister" he would be extremely and particularly happy of having the opportunity of so doing. One member said the man who could write such a letter was a disgrace to any denomination, but I should imagin he was a fair sample of his kind. A parson always flies to arms if there is any suggestion of cutting down his fees. He prefers the cash to waiting till he is fed by ravens.

Messrs. Foote and Ramsey hav met with a slice of bad luck. A fire which broke out in an adjoining building caught their premises, and did a great amount of damage, and I hear just at the critical time they were uninsured. There will be great joy in the Christian community in consequence, and it will no doubt be attributed to the just anger of the Lord, though in such case it was rather clumsily managed, as so much property belonging to others, who are not Atheists, has also been destroyed.

The elections this time hav gone against Gladstone, but then this would be only what might be anticipated, as it could scarcely be expected that a Christian nation would in anywise be willing to grant any degree of justice to a subject race. There may, however, not hav been quite so much opposition to the measure had the land-purchase scheme been left out, and many who were not unfavorable to Home Rule could not agree to being further heavily taxed solely for the benefit of the landlord tribe. Of course the usual religious animosity was imported into the matter, and fervid Protestants, though fully assured that the Lord was with them and approved thoroughly of their form of religion, were not quite so certain that he could protect them against the encroachments of the scarlet woman, and so considered that they could manage the matter so much better themselvs by keeping the Irish down.

Beecher has been considerably lionized here, and as his motto is "No pay, no preach," no doubt he is making a very good thing of his visit. As he does not appear to believe in hell and its accessories, I don't quite see how those who do can giv him what they term "the right hand of fellowship," but as he can draw a crowd and is pretty well known in one way or another, a trifling difference in doctrinal points won't matter much.

I hear that Charles Watts is lecturing about the country, but it appears he does not intend taking up his residence here, and contemplates returning to his adopted home next month. I hav not run across him yet, but may do so, perhaps, before he is off again. J. D.

Proof.

In general discussions there seems to be a great tendency to regard the word proof as absolute instead of conditional in its signification. One person states that a certain proposition or fact has been proved, positivly; another, with the same evidence, declares that it has not been proved. Each seems to think that if he regards it as proved or not proved, it is so, and the whole world ought to coincide and thus the question will be settled. But the question whether or not a proposition has been proved depends largely on who the umpire is.

One definition of proof, as given by Webster, is, "That degree of evidence which convinces the mind of the certainty of truth or fact, and produces belief." The degree of evidence necessary to convince the mind and produce belief varies greatly in individuals. Should a person of superior intelligence and remarkable truthfulness solemnly state that he once saw a man lift himself from the ground grasping one of his boot-tops in each hand and remain suspended in the air for several minutes, doubtless people could be found sufficiently ignorant and credulous to believe it. That such an act took place would be proved to those people. The bare statement by a certain person would be sufficient to produce belief. Take the average preacher. What does proof mean to him? He knows that the basis of his religion is true because it has been proved. He will tell you that the Bible is true because it is the word of God, and he knows there is a God because the Bible says so. The existence of God and the truth of the Bible hav been irresistibly and conclusivly proved to him. Ask him how he knows there is a God, aside from the Bible testimony, and he will tell you that the world couldn't hav come by chance, therefore there must be a God. Chance and God, with him, are the only sources whence the universe could hav proceeded. It would be useless to question him further. If you undertake to "corner" him by asking him if he can form any clearer conception of the process of the creation of something from nothing by a God than by a man, and how he knows that God (who must be something if he exists at all) could hav been eternally self-existent but matter must hav been created, and so on, he will either "decline to discuss sacred subjects with an unbeliever," or fly back to his stronghold, the Bible.

The Spiritualist has no proof of a God, but abundance of proof of the existence of disembodied spirits. The Materialist, though he may hav witnessed all the so-called Spiritual phenomena, has not had "that degree of evidence which convinces the mind," therefore the existence of no kind of supernatural or spiritual beings has been proved to him.

But the general standard of proof is evidence of a kind and amount sufficient to produce a general concurrence of conviction in those fully competent to judge, without regard to prejudice, belief, or peculiar mental constitution; such as that in favor of what are known as the established facts of science, and such as may be examined and weighed by ordinary persons under ordinary circumstances.

There are four orders of beings, gods, devils, angels, and spirits; multiplied millions of people hav believed in the existence of all of them, many other millions hav believed in part of them, and those beliefs hav exerted and will continue to exert an all-potent influence on the actions, development, and historical destiny of mankind, but the actual existence of none of these beings has ever been proved, giving to the word "proof" anything like its just and proper sense.

It is amusing to read the communication of A. A. Noe, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 17th. He says: "I challenge any Materialist to prove Materialism to be true. Do you know that death ends all?"

What a waste of words! The Materialist might giv reasons "scores and scores of times" why he believes life to be the result of organization, but it would be no proof to Mr. Noe. He says: "I hav spent several hundred dollars to get the facts. Yes, sir; I hav spent time and money to get the facts, and I hav got them." No doubt of it. There are dozens of mediums in this country who are willing, even anxious, to exchange any number of Spiritual facts for several hundred material dollars of the republic. But why is it that the truth of those facts has not been demonstrated to the satisfaction of all the adults of Ohio (Mr. Noe's state), or even half of them? A large proportion of people are impressed with the idea that a very general belief, a belief held by a large majority, amounts to proof.

The exact location of the soul in the body has been variously placed, some placing it in the brain, some in the heart, etc., but I think that formerly the most favored place was in the pineal gland, a small organ in the base of the brain.

If all were agreed, this would giv us an approximate idea of the size of the soul; but the ancient Romans believed the shade or spirit to be larger than the physical frame. It is quite clear that no soul has ever been measured with sufficient accuracy to enable any tailor in this world to guarantee a good fit. The opinions of religionists regarding the employment of souls are very nebulous, and Spiritualists are scarcely more definit; so that simply the belief that there is a future existence is the only one that can properly be called general. Every thinking person who will reflect a little on the list of exploded beliefs will readily admit that mere belief on any subject, no matter by how many held, furnishes no element of proof, and must be discarded in considering the question of proof. If Spiritualism be true, it is simply one of the immutable facts of nature, and must be proved, if at all, by scientific methods, as any other scientific fact. Kepler proved that planets moved in ellipses; Newton proved the persistence of mechanical force; Lavoisier proved the persistence of ponderable matter, showing that no atom of matter could be destroyed or created; it was proved that Guiteau shot Garfield; it has been proved that violations of natural laws are injurious to health. Prove Spiritualism as truly as any of the above facts hav been proved, and you can count all the Materialists in this country on the fingers of one hand. The Materialist may not be able to prove that "death ends all," but he has an immense advantage over the Spiritualist, for he has something to work upon; something from which data can be derived; something which can be examined and analyzed, viz., matter. Everybody believes in matter. It has often been stated, however, that Bishop Berkeley (born in 1684) argued against the existence of matter. Even Byron said, "When Bishop Berkeley said there was no matter, and proved it, 'twas no matter what he said" (Don Juan). But this is a mistake, probably due to misconceptions and illogical inferences. Berkeley carried the spiritualistic doctrin to a great extreme, but his argument was that we hav no more grounds for doubting the existence of spirit than we hav for denying the existence of matter. Quite a different thing.

Suppose a case. A seance is held. I attend, by invitation of a zealous Spiritualist, one who has "got the facts," having paid well for them—Mr. Noe, for instance—who guarantees to furnish me with positiv proof of a spirit existence. I promis to do my utmost to grasp every scintilla of evidence, and giv it due weight. The medium shows me a pair of clean slates, on which I can see no writing. She places a bit of pencil between them, locks them, and places them in a certain position. Soon a scratching is heard, and in a short time the slates are opened, and behold! several lines of writing are seen upon them, signed, D. M. Bennett, for instance. My friend shows me the slates, and says, triumphantly, "See that writing. The medium did not write it and could not (?) hav written it, therefore Bennett's spirit must hav written it."

Here, then, is the vaunted proof. I see writing on a slate. I cannot explain how it was produced, and frankly say so. Spiritualism has been proved true, and I am expected to understand it. That is my friend's position at this point. But I reply that all is not clear; that when I consider the marvelous feats of legerdemain, the production of writing in an unaccountable manner fails to make a very deep impression of any kind on my mind.

But, granting the entire absence of trickery, I fail to see even the ghost of anything like proof. I know that writing has been produced in various ways by human beings, and no other beings anywhere can write, so far as I know; hence writing, of itself, wherever found and under whatever circumstances, is prima facie evidence of human handiwork and cannot be ascribed to any other than a living person unless positiv evidence, wholly independent of the writing itself, is produced of some other agency. No such evidence has been produced, hence it must still be held that this writing is the work of a living person. "But," says my friend, "our observation failed to detect any person doing it, yet it indicates intelligence." I reply, "If you depend on intelligence for a solution, tell me what intelligence is like. I will giv you five minutes to form a mental picture of intelligence and tell me one of its properties. You find it impossible to form a conception of intelligence except as manifested by some organized being. If a spirit wrote that, the pencil was moved by muscular power. Muscular power implies muscles, and muscles imply all the other organs of a conscious being. Now, no person can conceive of an organized being passing through a slate, or even through the crack between the frames. No organism could pass through solid matter without disintegration. A vague, shadowy, misty outline of a human form appears to your imagination. That is the spirit. You are puzzled to know how the writing was produced, and you jump to the conclusion that the spirit did it; but to realize, even in the remotest degree, the act of passing to the inside of the slate and moving the pencil is wholly beyond human comprehension."

Fancy the dignified George Washington, in a Revolutionary suit, crawling through the crack between two slate-frames at the request of the celebrated medium, Madam Fizzletop, of Shinbone Alley, who, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar of lawful money, has undertaken to astonish the senses and gratify the morbid curiosity of Mr. Josiah Hayseed.

"Now, there are two properties common to and pervading all matter and inseparable from it—inertia and gravity. If the bodies of spirits are lighter than air, bulk for bulk, they will rise above it; if they are heavier, they will come to the ground in spite of intelligence; hence the alleged power of spirits to roam through space at will, visit other planets, etc., is impossible, and I ask you to prove the act possible before asking me again to believe that a spirit did the writing." "But perhaps they hav wings." "Perhaps, but there is not the least ground for such a supposition, and no body heavy enough to come to the ground could fly with wings anywhere near to the top of our atmosphere, to say nothing of going through a supposed ethereal substance not known to exist. You persist in assuming the truth of the very fact you hav set out to prove. No matter how much you know about spirits, you must constantly bear in mind that I know absolutely nothing. I hav not the least conception of the form, weight, size, color, or substance of a spirit. During the test I saw and heard nothing but objects perfectly familiar. Then how can writing or any other alleged spiritual performance giv me the least idea of what it is like? Fill ten slates with writing, cover the walls of a room with writing in an instant, and still I deny that the first element of proof of spirit existence has been furnished, and I will trust the decision of this point to any eminent lawyer or scientist in this country.

"Can you or any of the professors you hav named tell me anything about the substance composing spiritual bodies? Does it contain one or more or none of the sixty-three elements composing all known matter? If any, which? If none, of what is it composed? Hav you ever had a piece of spiritual substance in your hand? Hav any of your professors ever analyzed any of it? If so, please name some of its properties? Is it elastic or rigid? Is it affected by heat and cold? Where is the source of supply? You can giv no information on any of these points, yet you are sure there is such a thing. The question of spiritual garments has been mentioned so often I will refrain from asking any questions about them. Neither will I inquire about spiritual food, though it would be interesting to know whether spirits hav beefsteak every day, and whether they hav to work for it. If spirit bodies are composed of matter, their alleged acts hav been shown to be impossible; if they are composed of a substance whose properties are unknown, how do you know that they could act on matter, which they must do if their alleged acts are real?

"You say that spirits are invisible because of the fineness or rarity of the substance composing them. Now, substance that is invisible in daylight because of its rarity cannot be seen at night even with the aid of an electric light. Then why is a dark place always necessary to the production of a spirit? Is this not suspicious, to say the least? They say that a spirit becomes visible by taking on some of the grosser substance of the medium. An ingenious solution, truly. That is the most consummate piece of humbug the most audacious impostor ever conceived. There is nothing analogous to it in all nature, and the fact that intelligent people can swallow such stuff denotes a degree of credulity that is not only amazing but lamentable. Why don't the mediums supply them with means to make themselvs heard? Again, if D. M. Bennett (or any other person of good character) was as honest a man as his most intimate friends claim, and wanted to inform the world of the truth of the sublime and thrilling fact of continued existence, that information would be free. I utterly refuse to believe that he would communicate through, and thus become an accomplice of, any medium who would use such information as a means of acquiring sordid gain, besides suffering the mortification of finding himself disbelieved by some of his best friends. This is only an inference, and could not affect any positiv evidence of spirit life, but in the absence of such evidence it has a bearing on the question of inherent probability."

Professor Bain, of Aberdeen University, one of the greatest logicians of the world, and author of several standard scientific works, says: "The phenomena of clairvoyance are all in the position of antecedent in-credibility. That anyone should see with the eyes bandaged is at variance with the conditions of vision as established by all the authentic experience of the human race. Yet this has been affirmed by multitudes of witnesses. The testimony of witnesses, however, in such a matter cannot be received. The sole condition of admitting such a fact would be (what has never yet been attempted) a rigorous verification according to the methods of experimental science. So with the other facts of the same class—prophetic dreams, visions, or intimations of events at a distance. These are all opposed to well-established inductions."

Let those who find solace in a hope of continued existence still cherish that hope. I hav no wish to destroy it; but to say that spirit life has been proved is nothing less than gross absurdity, closely bordering on idiocy. As Professor Tyndall says: "And if you are content to make your 'soul' a poetic rendering of a phenomenon which refuses the yoke of ordinary mechanical laws, I, for one, would not object to this exercise of ideality."

The poet, the philosopher, the scientist, the philanthropist, all who hav acquired honorable fame, hav left an imperishable impress on the world that will mold, in some degree, our opinions and characters and those of succeeding generations, and will cause them to be held in grateful remembrance down through the coming ages. This is a glorious immortality and a true one. Let them rest. Do not dishonor the memories of the noble dead by dragging them out on midnight errands at the beck and call of ignorant charlatans, preying on the misplaced credulity of their fellow-creatures.

How hav the mighty fallen!

The departed great ones of earth hav shrunk in bodily proportions to the size of a needle's point, and it is noticeable that their intellects hav shrunk in a proportionate degree, judging from mediumistic accounts. This shows that mediums are not lost to a sense of fitness in every respect. No man, since reaching the alleged spirit-world, has ever said a truer, wiser, or more important thing than he did when living, and has never blessed the world with the least scrap of useful information. News and Notes.

Greeley, Col., was founded sixteen years ago by a colony mainly from New England and New York, and through many struggles has at last acquired a substantial property. The farming lands about it are excellent and in a high state of cultivation. The once cactus-covered plains are now beautiful with groves and abundant harvests. Greeley is like a jewel set in the garden spot of Colorado.

I found a good resting-place at the home of Captain A. J. Wadlia, a sailor and a soldier who has had a varied experience and won his way amid many difficulties, and is an ardent Freethinker. He has had too much good sense, and disciplin out of life's battles, to be anything else. Mr. and Mrs. Wadlia made my first experience of Colorado quite refreshing.

Our friend J. W. Leighton is quite an activ worker, and he does not allow orthodoxy to hav much rest. He spares neither time nor money in the cause of Freethought. His family also is Liberal, and I enjoyed their pleasant hospitality.

Dr. Camp and his family are equally enthusiastic, and it was quite a pleasure to meet with those who are so thoroughly interested in advanced ideas.

There are many Liberals in Greeley, and it is well worthy of the good name it bears. There is a Unitarian society established here on a somewhat radical basis, and it is evidently on the side of Freethought. I gave my lectures in its hall, and many of the Liberal Christians were present, although some of them are too conservativ yet to associate with anything outside of Christianity. However, the drift of the Unitarian church in this place is progressiv, and, prayers to the contrary notwithstanding, it will do much for science and humanity; and for this it has our best wishes for its success.

Capt. David Boyd, M. J. Hoagerty, H. C. Watson, J. E. Williams, Samuel Graham, F. E. Smith, Mr. Hooper, and others are interested in the Liberal work, and through their influence this part of Colorado will be a fruitful field for effort. Some of our friends are Spiritualists, but are broad and generous-minded, and for the time being find their summerland in the duties and interests of this world. Such humanitarian Spiritualism I enjoy.

I had excellent audiences at both lectures. The hall was full and my most radical utterances were warmly received. I think a Secular Union will be established here—not in opposition to other Liberal societies, but to emphasize and distinctly labor for the Nine Demands—the importance of which all admit.

Mr. John Leary and Mrs. Sheppard decorated the platform with flowers, and Mr. I. N. Stevens entertained us with delightful music, and thus our intellectual pathway was inspired by the genius of art.

I am now at the pleasant home of Col. John R. Kelso and his wife Mrs. Etta Dunbar Kelso. I arose early enough this morning to see the sun rise, and it was indeed an enchantment. The eastern sky seemed one mass of gold, and all the fields were radiant in the intense light, and a thousand varying colors dashed over the lofty forms of the mountains. I came here on Tuesday last, August 3d, and hav given three lectures to good houses, in spite of the busy season and thundershowers which hav kept some away. A Secular Union has been formed, and it looks as if a strong and activ organization would exist here. There are a large number of Liberals to keep things a-going, if well organized. I find Colonel Kelso a most genial gentleman, and it is a great pleasure to meet and talk with one who has had such a varied life. He has been a Methodist minister, a teacher, and then a soldier in the army of the Union, passing through nearly a hundred battles and many romantic incidents and adventures, receiving fifteen wounds from rebel bullets. Afterwards he was member of Congress, in which capacity he showed his independence and courage; and then, again, he was the "school-master abroad" in California, where he has fought many a battle for Freethought. He is author of those profound and valuable works, "The Deity Analyzed," "The Bible Analyzed," "The Real Blasphemers," "The Devil's Defense," etc. He is just publishing a new work, "Spiritualism Sustained." I find the colonel, though once a hard-headed Materialist, is now a Spiritualist, made such by his own remarkable personal experiences. But his belief in other worlds than this does not diminish his enthusiasm for reform here and now, and he is a devoted laborer in the cause of mental emancipation. He sees the great dangers that threaten our free institutions, and, as in the war of the Rebellion, he is still ready to be a soldier in the pioneer ranks—and a forlorn hope, if need be—of our battling humanity. He has also prepared a work for publication entitled, "The Universe Analyzed," and from his well-known keenness and vigor of thought and originality we may expect a brilliant and startling book.

It was a pleasant surprise to find that Mrs. Kelso came from my first orthodox parish, De Kalb, Ill., where I used to preach in the Congregational church. She has been a teacher in that thriving city for several years, and has won eminent success in her profession. Her parents used to listen to my orthodox discourses, but, like myself, Mrs. Kelso has passed altogether beyond the bounds of orthodoxy and enjoys the broad and breezy common of the universe.

My lectures here were also made attractiv with music and recitations. Miss Mattie Ashe favored us with some excellent music. Mr. P. J. Ashe recited "The True Church;" Colonel Kelso, "The Schoolmaster's Dream," an original poem; and Mrs. Georgiana Rice, "No Sect in Heaven," all of which were entertaining attractions to the course of lectures, and made my own work easier and more productiv of good. Such I hope it will be in other places, for thus a better influence is given to the words of the lecturer.

I hav had a pleasant rest in the midst of farm life for the last few days. I am within sight of Long's Peak and the shining ranges of hills at the foot of which spread the bright and fruitful plains. The weather is lovely—the skies perfectly blue and the air most invigorating. I can go on my way rejoicing with such a pleasant refreshment of this happy and peaceful country life and the picture of an ideal home.

I hav also enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. M. H. Coffin in their "Sandstone Ranch." Mr. Coffin came here twenty-five years ago, one of the first settlers of the country; and, battling with nature, he has also battled with superstition. He is a stanch Liberal, and a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so is in fullest sympathy with advanced thought. So are Mrs. Coffin and all the children, and I had a most enjoyable visit in this home of Freethought.

Saturday (to-day), I had a pleasant sociable at their house, the "Lone Ranch," with Mr. and Mrs. Rice, and other Liberal friends. Especially was I delighted to meet Mr. Simons, the father of Mrs. Rice, now in his eighty-ninth year. For over half a century he has been a valiant soldier of freedom. His mind is still activ, and is well furnished with information, particularly in the science of astronomy. He is at home among the stars; he has caught their music in his soul, and hence he is a child of natnre, and death to him is a glorious rest. Amid the crown of age sparkles the vivacity of youth.

I lecture to-morrow—Sunday, Aug. 8th—and also the 15th, at Denver, in Tabor's Opera House, the largest and most magnificent opera house in the West. I hope to see it full of Liberals; and there are enough in Denver, I believe, to do this.

From Colorado I go to Nebraska and Kansas. I lecture in Seward, Neb., Aug. 21st, 22d, 23d; Valley Falls, Kan., Aug. 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th; West Point, Neb., Sept. 1st, 2d, 3d; Omaha, Sept. 5th; Cromwell, Iowa, Sept. 7th and 8th; Leon, Sept. 9th and 10th; Ottumwa, Sept. 12th; West Union, Iowa, Sept. 14th, 15th, 16th. I shall then lecture in Illinois, and close the campaign with a three-days' meeting at West Union, Ohio, Oct. 1st, 2d, 3d.

Longmont, Aug. 7, 1886. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL is arranging for a trip to Texas early in the fall, probably about the first of October, and will fill engagements on his way there, and as he will go by the way either of Iron Mountain Railroad or through southern Missouri, it will be well for the Liberals to drop him a line and arrange with him for lectures.

PROF. WM. SEYMOUR, of Philadelphia, president of the Pennsylvania Secular Union, has recovered from his long and dangerous sickness, and will lecture before the Pittsburgh Secular Union, Sunday, September 19th. He proposes to make a trip through Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Indiana, and desires lecture engagements in those states.

W. F. JAMIESON will begin his six months' lecture campaign in Montana, commencing at Butte City on Sunday evening, September 5th, and will lecture every Sunday evening of that month at the same place. The Liberals of Montana are invited to correspond with him, and lecture routes will be arranged immediately. Liberals along the route between Lake City and Montana who would like a lecture or two may address him without delay at Lake City, Minn.

LIBERALS will be glad to learn that Charles Watts will arrive in this country about the 25th of this month, and resume his lecture work. On the Sunday afternoon of September 12th he will speak for the Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia, at Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, upon "The French Revolution—Atheistic or Theistic," and in the evening upon "Theological Delusions—The Fall and the Atonement." Sunday, September 19th, his subjects before the same society will be "The Reformation—Protestantism and Catholicism, Which?" and "Miracles: What Do They Prove?" Afternoon lecture begins at 2:30; evening at 7:30. The lectures are free, and the public is always welcome.

J. E. REMSBURG has filled his engagements in Nebraska, delivering forty lectures in five weeks, and proceeds at once to his work in Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin. The following is a list of his appointments for these states:

Evolution and Special Creation.

Taking a retrospectiv view of the dark and unenlightened past when the mighty forces of nature were almost entirely hidden from the human gaze; contemplating the sad spectacle of our forefathers being sunken in gross superstition, ere the light of to-day had arisen above the horizon of mental ignorance, and contrasting the then limitation of knowledge with the extensiv educational acquirements now existing, what a pleasing contrast the intellectual advancement presents to the modern observer! Recognizing the glories of nature and finding ourselvs possessed of an amazing amount of information respecting the laws of nature and the phenomena with which these laws are connected—such information being for ages unknown to the great masses of the people—we are prompted to inquire what has produced this marvelous transformation, and to what agency we are indebted for this grand and stupendous revolution of the nineteenth century. Whatever way be the reply of the theologian, whose intellect is too often clouded with dreamy imaginations, the answer of the patient and unfettered student of nature will be that it is to science we owe the magic power which has substituted for the dense darkness of the past the brilliant light of the present. The marvels of astronomy, the revelations of geology, the splendors of botany, the varieties of zoology, the wonders of anatomy, the useful discoveries of physiology, and the rapid strides which hav been made in the development of the mental sciences all combine to unravel the once mysterious operations of mind and matter. While a knowledge of all the sciences has corrected long-cherished errors and opened new paths of investigation, one or two of them hav especially tended to unfold to our gaze the nature, relativity, and development of man and the wonderful universe to which he belongs. For instance, without the science of geology we should forever hav remained in ignorance of the various changes that had taken place on the earth previous to the appearance of man and the different forms of animal and vegetable life that were then distributed over its surface. We now examin the various strata of the earth, and there discover the fossil remains of animals and plants that existed in the ages that rolled by when no historian lived to pen the mighty transactions of nature and hand them down to future generations. The science of electricity, too, only now in its infancy, is calculated to confer an amount of benefit upon mankind too vast to be ever told. We now hear the thunder roar, and behold the vivid flash of lightning darting before our eyes like an arrow from the bow of the archer; but while we regard this phenomenon we hav learned not to look upon it with dread as the vengeance of an angry God, but as a natural result of the operation of known forces. It was for Dr. Watts to sing:

> There all his stores of lightning lie
> Till vengeance darts them down.

But it remained for a Franklin and a Priestley to inform us that tempests were not to be beheld as indicating the wrath of an offended God, but the effect of an unequal diffusion of the electric fluid. Thus science has been and is our benefactor, our enlightener, our improver, and our redeemer. Without its aid we should still hav been in a state of mental darkness and physical degradation. Deprived of its discoveries we should still hav been bound down with the ties of superstition, ignorance, and fanaticism. As Pope observes:

> Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutored mind
> Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind;
> His soul proud Science never taught to stray
> Far as the solar walk or milky way.

Perhaps there is no domain of human thought where the advantages of scientific investigation are more clear and pronounced than in connection with what is termed "Evolution;" a word which within the last few years has become very popular as representing a theory of man and the universe opposed to the old orthodox notion of special creation and supernatural government. There are, of course, some professedly religious people who avow their belief in evolution, and who maintain that it is what they term God's mode of working; and there are those who even go so far as to say that the power and wisdom of God are seen more thoroughly displayed in the process of evolution than in the method so long believed in of special and supernatural creation. But the number of these is comparativly small, and consequently the great mass of those who accept the word in its legitimate signification may be looked upon as of a skeptical turn of mind. It will not be difficult to demonstrate that the popular theological idea of creation finds no support in the theory of evolution, which, if not a demonstrated science, it has, at least, in its favor, the "science of probabilities," an advantage that cannot be fairly claimed for the Biblical account of the origin of phenomena.

The word evolution may be defined as an unfolding, opening out, or unwinding; a disclosure of something which was not previously known, but which existed before in a more condensed or hidden form. A simple illustration of this meaning is found in the unwinding of a long thread of cotton from a reel or spool. There is no new existence called into being, but a making conspicuous to our eyes that which was previously concealed. According to Mr. Herbert Spencer, the whole theory is based upon three principles—namely, that matter is indestructible, motion continuous, and force persistent. Two contending processes will be seen everywhere in operation in the physical universe, the one antagonistic to the other, each one for a time triumphing over its opposit. These are termed evolution and dissolution. Spencer remarks that "evolution, under its simplest aspect, is the integration of matter and the dissipation of motion, while dissolution is the absorption of motion and the concomitant disintegration of matter." Thus it will be seen that Herbert Spencer regards evolution as the concentration or transition of matter from a diffused to a more condensed and perceptible form. This change he traces in the systems of the stars; in the geological history of the earth; in the growth and development of plants and animals; in the history of language and fine arts, and in the condition of civilized states. Briefly, the theory is that the matter of which the universe is composed has progressed from a vague, incoherent, and perhaps all but homogeneous nebula of tremendous extent to complete systems of suns, worlds, comets, sea, and land, and countless varieties of living things, each composed of many very different parts and of complex organizations.

Coming to organic bodies, there may be included under the term, "evolution," many different laws, some of which we may not even know as yet, and a great number of processes, acting sometimes in unison and often in antagonism, the one to the other. This, however, in no way destroys the theory of evolution, which, beyond doubt, is the process by which things hav been brought to their present condition. It will tend, perhaps, to elucidate this truth the more readily and clearly if a brief exposition of this theory be given under the different heads of the various sections of this extensiv subject.

THE FORMATION OF WORLDS.

According to evolution, there was a time in the remote past, the date of which we cannot even imagin, and any attempt to comprehend the periods that hav rolled by since would paralyze our highest intellectual powers. When the matter which is now seen shaped into suns and stars of vast magnitude, and of incomprehensible number, was diffused over the whole of the space in which those bodies are now seen moving—of extreme variety and, perhaps, of nearly homogeneous character—the human mind is unable to comprehend. This matter, by virtue of the very laws now seen in operation in the physical universe, would in time shape itself into bodies with which the heavens are strewed, shining with a glory that awes while it charms. What is called in these days the nebular cosmogony may be said to hav arisen with Sir William Herschel, who discovered with his telescope what seemed to be worlds and systems in course of formation—that is, they were in various states which appeared to mark a gradation and different degrees of condensation.

M. Laplace, without any knowledge of Herschel's speculations, arrived at a similar idea upon totally different grounds—namely, the uniformity of the heavenly bodies. He showed that if matter existed in such a different state as the nebular theory assumed, and if nuclei existed in it, there would become centers of aggregation in which a rotary motion would increase as the agglomeration proceeded. Further, Laplace urged that at certain intervals the centrifugal force, acting from the rotating mass, would overcome the force of agglomeration, and the result would be a series of rings existing apart from the mass to which they originally adhered, each of which would retain the motion which it possessed at the moment of separation. These rings would again break up into spherical bodies, and hence come what are termed primary planets and their satellites. This Laplace showed to be at least possible, and the results, in the case of our solar system, are just what would hav been expected from the operations of this law. For example, everyone knows that the rapidity of the motions in the planets is in the ratio of their nearness to the sun.

Many facts seem to support this theory, such as the existence of the hundred and more small bodies called asteroids observed between Mars and Jupiter, which doubtless indicate a zone agglomeration at several points, and the rings of Saturn giving an example of zones still preserved intact. This theory has been held by some of the most eminent astronomers, and is most ably advocated by the late Professor Nichol in his "Architecture of the Heavens." Some experiments hav also been tried—as, for example, that of Plateau on a rotating globe of oil—which show the operation of the law by which suns, planets, and their moons were formed. This is the evolution of worlds, and it is unnecessary to point out how diametrically this is opposed to the special creation described in Genesis, where the heavens and the earth are called suddenly into being by the fiat of God, and the sun stated to be created four days afterward. Which theory should, in these days of thought, commend itself to a rational mind?

THE BEGINNING OF LIFE UPON THE EARTH.

Evolution has been subject to many severe attacks at this point. Those who contend for special creation hav maintained, with a dogmatism which but ill accords with the knowledge they possess upon the subject, that nothing but the hypothesis of the supernatural origin of things is sufficient to account for the first appearance of life upon the earth; that evolution completely breaks down here; and that all the experiments that hav been conducted with a view to lend it support hav turned out positiv failures. Such is the allegation of orthodox opponents. Let us see what grounds they hav for these reckless and dogmatic statements. The two views of the origin of living beings hav been called respectivly Biogenesis and Abiogenesis, the first meaning that life can only spring from prior life, and the latter that life may sometimes hav its origin in dead matter. Dr. Charlton Bastian, whose experiments will be hereafter referred to, substitutes for Abiogenesis another word, Archebiosis.

Now, it is well known and admitted on all hands that there was a time when no life existed on the earth. Not the most minute animal, or the most insignificant plant, found a place on the surface of what was probably at that time a globe heated up to a temperature at which no living thing could exist. The life, therefore, that did afterwards appear, could not hav sprung from germs of prior living bodies. True, the whimsical theory was put forward by an eminent scientific man some years ago, that the first germs that found their way to the earth were probably thrown off from some other planet with meteoric matter. But, on the face of it, this is absurd, because such matter would be of too high a temperature to admit of the existence upon it of living bodies of any kind, and besides, were it otherwise, it would explain nothing. It would only transfer the difficulty from this world to some other. For life must hav had a beginning somewhere, and the question is as to that beginning somewhere. The supernaturalist seeks to get out of the difficulty rather by cutting the Gordian knot than by untying it, and falls back upon a special creation, and so avoids any further trouble about the matter. But the evolutionist thinks that he can see his way clearly in what must necessarily be to some extent a labyrinth, because no one lived at that time to observe and record what was taking place.

One thing is clear, which is that living things were made or came into existence—whatever the mode may hav been, or the power by which it occurred—out of non-living matter. Even the believers in special creation will not deny this. The only question is, therefore, whether the process occurred in accordance with natural law, and whether the forces by which it was brought about were those which exist, or, at all events, which did exist, in material nature. For it does not follow that, if such phenomena do not occur to-day, they could never hav taken place in the past. The conditions of the earth were then different from what they are now, and forces may hav been in operation that are now quiescent. Professor Huxley, who thinks that no instance has occurred in modern times of the evolution of a living organism from dead matter, and that the experiments that hav been conducted on the subject are inconclusiv—who, in fact, ranks himself on the side of the advocates of Biogenesis—yet says that, if we could go back millions of years to the dawn of life, we should, no doubt, behold living bodies springing from non-living matter.

But, of course, it will be argued that, if it happened then, it might take place now; and although, as I hav said, this is not conclusiv, yet to some it has much weight. What nature has once done she can do again. Quite so; but then all the conditions must be the same. Dr. Bastian himself asks the question, "If such synthetic processes took place then, why should they not take place now. Why should the inherent molecular properties of various kinds of matter hav undergone so much alteration?" ("Beginnings of Life"). And the question is likely to be repeated with, to say the least of it, some show of reason.

It must never be forgotten, as Tyndall has very ably pointed out, that the matter of which the organic body is built up "is that of inorganic nature. There is no substance in the animal tissues that is not primarily derived from the rocks, the water, and the air." And the forces operating in the one are those which we see working in the other, vitality only excepted, which is probably only another correlation of the one great force of the universe. Indeed, Professor Huxley does not make an exception even in the case of vitality, which, he maintains, has no more actual existence than the imaginary aqueosity of water. Mr. Herbert Spencer thinks that life, under all its forms, has arisen by an unbroken evolution, and through natural causes alone, and this view, in my opinion, accords with the highest reason and philosophy.

CHARLES WATTS.

June 27, 1885—August 5, 1886.

[In THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 27, 1885, Mr. C. W. Stewart, of Liberal, Mo., gave the particulars, illustrated by a diagram and supported by sworn statements, of seances held with a "Dr." Bouton of that place. He averred that the conditions were such as to preclude fraud, being "the most rigid test conditions." The cabinet, or closet, was inspected and found to be "as represented." A "most thorough investigation of the premises was made, going into the cellar, upon the roof, and through every room, and testing the strength of the floor, ceiling, and walls of the closet." One affidavit appended by Mr. Stewart said: "We hav made a thorough examination of the said premises, and we hereby pronounce it utterly impossible that said writing can occur through visible or tangible human agency." This was sworn to by C. W. Stewart, D. P. Greely, C. W. Goodlander, Jr., John G. Meyer, and G. H. Walser. The said writing purported to be a communication on a slate from the founder of of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The writing and signature Mr. Stewart pronounced to be "almost fac-similes of specimens of D. M. Bennett's writing." Samples of the signature so obtained were sent to this office for identification, but were pronounced fraudulent by persons familiar with Mr. Bennett's handwriting. An enthusiastic lady who publishes a paper out in Iowa thereupon printed some caustic remarks about the intolerance of Materialism, and added by way of a clincher, "He came to his own and his own received him not."

The following article is from G. H. Walser's Liberal of August 5, 1886. The only comment we hav to make is that it shows there is nothing easier in this world than to be mistaken.—ED. T. S.]

A FRAUD MATERIALIZED.

For near two years we hav been giving to the world from time to time the wonderful spiritualistic manifestations through the mediumship of Dr. J. B. Bouton, an old resident of Liberal, who was universally looked upon as a quiet, unassuming, and unpretentious man, who could not slick the people by tricks if he desired to do so. Bouton is about sixty years of age, has a wife and a bright little boy of four years. He has been holding seances at his house, producing wonderful independent slate-writings from a closet constructed in one corner of his seance room. This closet had been inspected by various parties and universally pronounced perfectly intact, without a blind or trap-door anywhere except the one accessible from the public room. Clean slates were placed on a shelf near the top of this closet, and in a short time three little raps were given; the door would be opened and the slate taken out with a communication on it to some person present, with the signature of some departed person signed to it; the doctor all the while sitting in the room with the visitors in full lamplight. This, of course, created great excitement, and the wonderful powers of the doctor were heralded all over the country, while he seemed to grow fat and lazy from the rich harvest he was getting. He was kept on the fat of the land, parties were made for him, gifts were bestowed, obeisances paid, and honors given him on all occasions. Many sought the opportunity of gaining from this heavenly-favored, good man a smile; others the privilege of touching his sacred garments. His name had softened. The air about him seemed to come fresh from the ambrosial fields where gods are wont to revel and sip sweet nectar from perennial flowers. We know of no one who beheld more comeliness in his make-up than we did. The old tobacco-besmeared chops of yore didn't look half so dirty. We formerly regarded him as a kind of a root-and-herb impostor, a poor carpenter, and a worse doctor; but of late we hav been writing his name with M.D. attached, doubly capped. We "fess up," while three-fourths of the people, as big fools as we were, now say they always thought he was a fraud.

The slate-writing seances were not all. There were materializations more natural than life. These would occur in an adjoining room while the doctor sat with the spectators in another room. There were two doors to that room, but we all knew that the doctor was perfectly reliable and would not degrade himself by any false demonstrations. We knew, too, that no citizen of Liberal would be mean enough to attempt a fraud on the credit of the dead. There was where we were fooled again.

The house where the seances occurred is a one-story wooden structure. The seance room was built several years ago. It is about fourteen feet square, and made box fashion. Subsequently there was a kitchen added. In the ceiling of this kitchen there is a scuttle-hole large enough for a man to get through. The attic of the kitchen is easy of access through this scuttle; but when up there the explorer was confronted with what seemed to be a solid board wall, to all appearances the old siding of the original house. About two years ago an L was put to the other side of the old room. The seance closet was placed in the old house, the top reaching to the ceiling.

On last Thursday, about two o'clock in the afternoon, the house was discovered to be on fire from the roof, having caught from a defectiv flue. In a short time buckets, water, and men were in full service. With the aid of an ax the shingles were cut away and the flames subdued; revealing, when out, the fact that in the top of the closet was a neatly-fitting trap-door, lined on the edges with cloth, so as to be opened without noise, with a strap attached to raise it by. This was fastened by adjustable braces from above, so completely keeping the trap-door in place that it was impossible to detect the fraud from below. In what seemed to be the solid partition, between the kitchen attic and top of the seance room, was found an adjustable door. This was so arranged that when the accomplice was through the kitchen hatchway, the partition door was easily removed, and the scoundrel at once in control of the upper part of the closet where the slates were deposited for spirit communications. Over the kitchen were found two tin buckets or cans which would hold about one gallon each. In the side of each was a hole, cut about two inches wide and three inches long, with perforations in the bottom to admit air. On the inside of these cans was lamp-smoke, indicating plainly that they had been placed over a lamp and used as dark lanterns.

When the fire was raging the doctor frequently urged the persons trying to save the house to let it go, it could not be saved; and when he found that the flames were extinguished and his fraud laid bare, he exclaimed, "I am ruined!" and vomited for shame.

His accomplices are well known in this community and cordially despised. They are now trying to cheek it out by getting up a laugh on the Spiritualists and friends who treated them as honest citizens in an honest attempt to investigate a natural phenomenon. As well might the thief laugh at his victim, or the assassin at the bloody corse quivering before him. The man who will enrich himself by using the memory of the dead is too degraded for the application of human language. Words are too frail to express the fulness of honest contempt for such. The mind that conceives such a crime would not hesitate at anything if sure of escaping the penalty of the law.

After the fire Bouton wrote us the following letter, which explains itself:

FRIEND WALSER, Dear Sir: You hav been deceived, but it was not done for the purpose of harming you or any other person, but for what we believed to be the good of humanity: and when I explain to you our honest motiv in adopting this plan to investigate this thing called Spiritualism, I am confident that you will not blame us, or, at least, hold malice against us for letting the world know how easy it is to deceive the world. I was not yet ready for this. I had more wonderful things than they had yet seen. September and October were the months in which we intended to surprise you all, then giv you all the benefit of our investigation.

When you feel cool and calm I want to talk to you.

Yours truly, J. B. BOUTON.

An Avalanche!

Most of us can not get into our heads why a great revolution is pending through labor troubles, and expect that by some means we shall get back to old times. Never again in this world. About a hundred years ago every workman owned his capital—to wit, tools and simple machines. He did not divide his earnings so much with other people who do nothing. The weaver owned his loom, water-mills were the most important factories, and wherever nature furnished the power, it cost little to run a factory. Almost everything was done on a different plan. If you hired a man to chop or mow, he generally furnished his own tools. The earlier simple inventions took the place of tools more and more. A few men with a little money would combine and furnish the machines, and stand about to see the men work. They would pay the "hands" as little as possible, reserving a certain amount of the earnings to pay the interest on their capital. This reserve grew to be more than enough to barely replace the wear and tear, as was at first modestly claimed and was naturally used to put in more machinery. Soon the employer was able to hire more "hands," and his income swelled until here and there one more fortunate than the others could undersell and drive the others to the wall. This method of labor rapidly superseded all others, and was able to command the markets for sale of manufactures and for hire of labor. "It is so easy to grease a fat hog!" Like an avalanche, capital thus born was forever rolling and gathering. In our own land we might hav lived for a century or more in peace, and hav gradually adapted our conditions to the new methods, but for the war and the enormous advantages taken of our ignorance by which small fortunes were so highly swollen. Government bonds were first wrecked, and then strengthened when accumulated in a few hands; railway bonds ditto, and then the tariff on steel rails, coal, and other imports enabled a few persons to control the railway system and much of the manufactures. Several men, by the use of a few thousand dollars, often less than ten thousand, purchased bonds at one or two cents on the dollar and turned them over to the government at par, thus actually receiving a hundred dollars for one dollar, as was done in manipulation of Central Branch, K. P., and other stock. Many hundreds of millions hav thus been taken from the government by a few men or women. Nearly all the great millionaires of the East became such in this way. Yet every dollar has had to be replaced by the poorer people. It is paid by indirect taxation, in many ways, on many things. To the great mass of people it is felt by deprivation, is exhibited in reduced consumption, which passes on and off in lower wages, strikes, lock-outs, closing down, riot, arson, murder, and starvation and suicide.

And yet there are thousands of people who hav no idea that a swindle on government or extravagance by it affects them!

Well! So mighty hav been these accumulations of capital, that began thus humbly, now, to-day, almost everything, even in this new young nation, is under control of accumulated capital, and as its power grows it of course exacts more. The day has gone by when free trade can do much to relieve us. Capital is too powerful.

These monstrous capitalistic combinations are our best educators. They are leading in advance in the way the whole nation must go. The knell of the old order has been tolled. The people must all unite in one grand universal combination, and really and truly hav that thing so much talked of—government of, by, and for the people.

As it is now, we hav government over the people by a few agents for a few grand monopolies.

It is too late, too late to go back. Onward is the motto. HOLT.

Christian Temperance.

Christian temperance is one of the most positiv of paradoxes; it is one of the world's most flagrant contradictions. When Christians profess an intensity of temperance, look out for some terrible underlying vice or crime, such as dishonesty, adultery, but especially a mixed lasciviousness; and the moral obliquity attending their case you will find impenetrable.

Here is what a clergyman told me a few years ago: "Dansville was a quiet place, but prosperous. It was neither a temperance place nor a drunken one. Between twenty-five and thirty years ago, some kind of temperance organization or lodge was started, professing a Christian basis, and the place became a pandemonium and drunkenness soon multiplied. Prior to that time the social evil and bastardy were entirely unknown in Dansville. Behold! In less than one year after the organization of the temperance lodge aforesaid, lasciviousness had received such an incentiv as to become so common that no less than twenty bastards were born within the lodge itself—that is to say, among those who were or had been identified with the temperance lodge." Now, I do not vouch for the literal truth of this account, but I vouch for the fact that it was told me by a Christian clergyman. It cannot be false in all particulars. It may be an exaggeration, and it may, on the other hand, fall short of the degree of the vileness it refers to. The clergyman was familiar with matters as they stood at that time. In reference to Dansville temperance of the same period, an old gray-headed physician told me the following and vouched for the truth thereof: "Liquor selling was partially retrenched by law in Dansville. The druggists could sell by bottle to persons who furnished satisfactory reasons for their order, and those reasons were to be recorded. There was in those days a drugstore kept by a Mr. Casteline, since deceased. The records of that store, if still in existence, will show some astonishing items. A clergyman from a neighboring town used to come to Mr. Casteline for his liquor—liquors of various kinds. One time he had two bottles of brandy, two of rum, one of wine, and six of whisky, and entered them all in the records for sacramental purposes!" MAGYAR.

A Shameful Dogma.

The immaculate conception is a shameful dogma of a shameless church. A festival in honor of the "conception" is said to be traceable back to the sixth century, but the dogma was not fully established until December 8, 1854, when Pius IX. issued a decree declaring it to be an article of the Catholic faith.

Many intelligent and well-informed people do not understand what the dogma means. They think it relates merely to the birth of Jesus, but it goes back to the birth of the Virgin Mary. It would not do to hav her born in the ordinary may. As Joseph, though married to Mary, was not a husband with all that the name implies, so Anna, the mother of Mary, must hav a husband of the same sort.

The story is told in the Protevangelion, purporting to be written by James in Jerusalem, and is in substance as follows:

Joachim, a rich man, brought offerings to the Lord. Rubim, the priest, told him he must do so no more because he was childless. Joachim, in great grief, retired to the mountains, resolved to fast and pray until he could become a father. His wife, Anna, knowing not what had become of him, and supposing him dead, began to bewail her childless widowhood. But soon she put off her mourning garments, and resuming her wedding-dress took a walk in the garden. Sitting under a laurel-tree she prayed, not for a husband, but for a child. Looking up she saw the sparrow's nest. "Alas! O Lord," she said, "why am I not like the birds or beasts which are productiv before thee? I hav become a reproach to the sons of Israel, and they hav driven me in derision out of the temple of the Lord."

Just then a good angel appeared and promised to answer Anna's prayer. Presently two more angels came and told her her husband was alive and coming home; for another angel had heard Joachim's prayer and promised an answer.

The reunion of husband and wife was joyful. Joachim made a grand offering of goats, lambs, and calves to the priests, and in due time, reckoning no doubt from the good angel's visit in the garden, a female child was born, and they called her Mary.

A Dishonest Opinion of Other Opinions.

If we should, in the course of a column editorial, say that everyone who believes in God is insane; that every worshiper of Christ is stupidly superstitious; that real Christianity consisted of debauchery and licentiousness; that all professions of religion are empty boasts; that every church-goer is a fool, and that as for a Christian, we don't believe one exists—if we should put all that into less than a column of leaded long primer, we think the Christians might justly accuse us of being bigoted.

Yet these epithets and that conclusion is what the Christian at Work applies editorially to Atheists. The editor claims that every human being is "God-intoxicated," and naturally must, from his intuitions, believe in a creator, providential ruler, judge of all mankind. And he says it is his opinion that any human being who alleges that he does not believe in such a being is a liar, or a fool, or insane.

However, there is one consolation left the Atheists, which is that perhaps the editor of the Christian at Work is himself the liar. But if we thought we could get a truthful answer, we would like to ask him if he regards doubt of the existence of a devil as a symptom of mental aberration! A belief in devils is certainly older and more nearly universal than the belief in gods.

The New York State Convention.

The notice of the time and place of holding the Annual Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association is a little later than usual, but sufficiently previous to allow all to make preparations for attending.

The place selected is a very fine one, the only objection to it being that it is in the eastern part of the state. But as no arrangements could be made with the owners of any park in the western portion of New York, White Sulphur Springs Park was the best that could be done.

The railroad rates to the Convention can be made low by those attending purchasing excursion tickets to Saratoga. Nearly every railroad east of Chicago makes special rates to Saratoga, and those rates can be taken advantage of. "Excursion tickets" should be bought to insure lowest fare. From Saratoga a short railroad runs to the lake, and the steamboat lands passengers upon the grounds.

All the speakers invited hav not yet sent letters of acceptance, but the following hav written of their intention to attend: John Peck, Lucy N. Colman, W. S. Bell, Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, Susan H. Wixon, and J. L. Andrew—and Mrs. Juliet H. Severance will come if circumstances allow. Helen H. Gardener has but little doubt of her ability and no doubt of her eagerness to be there, and Elizabeth Cady Stanton thinks it the likeliest thing in the world that she will speak once or twice before the Convention. Charles Watts will arrive in time to take part in the speaking, and when the others who hav been invited are heard from, the list undoubtedly will be a long and splendid one.

Though this is a state Convention, the Executiv Committee hope to meet Freethinkers from many states besides New York. Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Canada, and the New England states are not too far off for their citizens to make the trip, and, as in the past, everybody is cordially invited and entreated to attend. The hotel rates are reasonable and the accommodations good. The Truth Seeker ventures to extend a little invitation also on its own account. The editor and business manager will be more than pleased on that occasion to shake hands with several hundred subscribers, and especial attention will be paid to any who may owe us arrearages.

This Convention, we think, will be one of the pleasantest yet held; certainly the officers of the Association will do their best to make it so. Apart from the great value of the lectures, the place, Mr. Reynolds says, has ample attractions to make a ten-days' stop there a little oasis in life.

What Ireland Needs.

The continued story of Orange and Catholic rioting in Ireland is sad reading. No war is so bitter as a religious war, no strife so deadly, no controversy so intemperate. Sectarianism divides sharper than national lines, and the people of different churches are almost as far apart as the living and the dead. The Irish troubles are new proofs of this, and these proofs are multiplying daily. The dispatches report hundreds wounded and scores killed. The rioting began when Gladstone's bill was defeated, and the Orange parade on the 12th of July intensified the hatred of Catholics to Protestants.

Belfast is now divided by strict lines into two divisions—Catholics and Protestants—and not an hour passes that some outrage upon one or the other sect is not perpetrated. On the 7th a body of Catholics found a Protestant woman upon the street, alone and defenseless, and they promptly abused her. The next day a crowd of Protestant women found a Catholic girl in their own neighborhood, and they quickly beat her almost to death, finishing their work by jumping upon her prostrate body. The police of Belfast are mostly Catholic, and the sight of one of them is sufficient to start a fight. Were it not for the English soldiers they would be massacred. The windows of the shops of the city are riddled with bullets fired by the Orangemen at the municipal force. When there are no police in sight the Orangemen attack Catholic civilians, which attacks are returned with interest by the Romanists. It is sufficient for a fight that two bodies of men of different sectarian beliefs meet upon the street. Even the wounded, as they are borne to the hospitals, are set upon by the mobs. The inhabitants of the meaner portions of the city point guns and pistols from their windows and shoot indiscriminately. Scores hav been wounded in this manner.

All this is solely the result of religion. The rioters hav no plans for anything but murder. The Orangemen do not want Home Rule, and they hate Catholics. So they commit murder. The Catholics hate the Protestants, and they kill them. These two religious bodies hav been at this business off and on ever since Luther's time, and the Belfast riots show their readiness to resume it whenever the occasion offers. English troops will be able to temporarily control these savages, but the only permanent cure for their bloodthirstiness is a complete eradication of their religious principles and a substitution therefor of an educated desire to serve humanity. Until this is accomplished, there is no security for Ireland. She needs the school-master much more than she needs Home Rule.

John Bunyan.

The Rev. Mr. John Brown is at present occupying the Bunyan Meeting at Bedford, Bedfordshire Co., England. He is therefore shepherd of the parish to which the immortal John Bunyan, author of "The Pilgrim's Progress," preached two hundred and thirty odd years ago. It is therefore proper that Mr. Brown should look up the genealogy of his predecessor, which he has done and published in a book. And it is noticeable that the name Bunyan, in going back toward the past, assumes as many different forms as do any of those which "Antichrist" attempts to follow through the labyrinths of sacred history. We hav Buignon, Buingnon, Bognum, and Bonyan. The representativ of the family when it was spelled Buingnon, it may here be remarked, was publicly hanged. John Bunyan was about the first of his family who amounted to anything, and he in early life, before he became addicted to preaching, followed the humble calling of a tinker. According to John's own account of it, he was an ignorant youth, being barely able to read and write; and those who hav read his "Pilgrim's Progress," especially the rhyme in the fore part of it, will not hesitate to believe his statement that "what little he learned he soon lost, even almost utterly." Mr. Bunyan also admits that he led a wild and reckless life; and it is greatly to his credit for candor that historians hav corroborated him. Coleridge, indeed, says that Bunyan's early life was that of "a bitter blackguard."

Bunyan did his first preaching as a settled pastor in a barn, his conversion to religion having come about through reading some religious books belonging to his wife. It is supposed that he abandoned his evil ways, though we find him classed among those who "under the profession of Christ held forth and practiced licentiousness." He was a Baptist, and his preaching got him into jail. Here he spent twelve years, and wrote his "Pilgrim's Progress," which has come down to us as one of the saddest results of imprisonment for opinion's sake. It appears that Bunyan himself had more or less doubt about the merits of his remarkable production, for in his poetical introduction he relates that he showed it in manuscript form to his friends, with this result:

> "Some said 'John print it;' others said 'not so.'
> Some said 'it might do good;' others said 'no!'"

We are of the opinion that those who said "John print it" must hav given the manuscript a very superficial reading, or else they were no friends of the author. It would be difficult to find a work of less contemporaneous human interest, unless it be the revised version of the Hebrew and Christian scriptures or Rose Elizabeth Cleveland's latest novel. Bunyan was a presumably good tinker spoiled in the making of a bad preacher and writer. He had a touch of genius, but his creations were warped, exaggerated, or deformed by superstition. It is interesting to review the career of a man who has such a prominent place in the history of a large religious sect, but his books should be kept out of the hands of children who are not old enough to understand that they contain nothing which is to be believed.

Boonton Again Awakened.

When C. B. Reynolds had procured the affidavits necessary to a criminal prosecution of the good Christians of Boonton who had wrecked his tent and to a civil suit against the town for the damages caused, he came up to this city to engage in the hard preliminary work of arranging for the state Convention. The Christians of Boonton breathed freer when they knew the Infidel had left the place, and they prayerfully hoped he would never return. The tax-payers do not like the prospect of paying for the tent, and the indicted rioters see the county court in the near distance and the state prison not far behind. But those who thought that they had seen the last of the Infidel were mistaken. On Wednesday, the 11th inst., Mr. Reynolds invaded the place again, armed with hundreds of copies of a small pamphlet on blasphemy, being the Truth Seeker editorial of August 14th, with some additional paragraphs addressed specifically to the inhabitants of Morris county, New Jersey. These he distributed in all the stores, and in most of the houses. It is needless to say that the pamphlet was thoroughly read.

The gossip and excitement resulting from the arrest had in a good measure subsided, but this second advent aroused the sleepy little town, and for the balance of the week blasphemy was again discussed. No violence was offered Mr. Reynolds, most of the rougher element being at work in the silk factory when the distribution was going on. The justice of the peace who held Mr. Reynolds to bail was encountered upon the street, and he extended his hand for a fraternal greeting. He got it, along with a pamphlet which had the needless effect of lengthening his Methodistical countenance about two inches. In common with the rest of the Christian population of Boonton, the justice finds that blasphemy is a ghost of puritanical times that will not down at his bidding. He can arrest Mr. Reynolds, but he cannot keep him out of Boonton.

Mr. Reynolds lectured for the Hempstead, L. I., Freethought Association on the afternoon and evening of August 15th, and will address the Liberals of Norwalk, Conn., to-morrow, the 22d. Until after the state Convention is held, he may be addressed in care of this office. No further legal steps in his Boonton case can be taken till after the Morris county grand jury hav met, but in the interim it is proposed to enlighten the population of the county upon theological matters and the relation Christianity sustains to law and liberty.

Mr. Ingersoll Will Defend Mr. Reynolds.

NEW YORK, Aug. 13, 1886.

E. M. MACDONALD, ESQ., Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER:

My Dear Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Baker has handed me your letter asking whether I would hav anything to do with the Reynolds case. Of course I shall help Mr. Reynolds. If I cannot be there in person, I am perfectly willing to pay somebody who can be. I believe in doing what little I can in defense of the liberty of speech, and I think it the duty of all Freethinkers to do what they can to teach the world better than to decide metaphysical questions by brute force. Yours very truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

The following sums hav been received by Mr. Reynolds to help defray the expenses caused by his arrest:

F. M. Borden	$1.00
J. F. Ruggles	2.00
M. Whittick	5.00
H. Tyler	1.00
E. M. Davis	5.00
T. R. Burroughs	1.00
W. T. Galloway	1.50
Wm. Krim	5.00
Wm. Fray	1.00
M. P. Thurston	3.00
John D. Powers	4.00

As will be seen by Mr. Ingersoll's letter, lawyers' fees are provided for, but there are many legal expenses in every case, besides the cost and expense of distribution of the literature necessary to enlighten and civilize the Christian heathen of New Jersey.

Editorial Notes.

THE New Era Gleaner, published at De Ruyter, N. Y., advises its readers to read THE TRUTH SEEKER. We sincerely hope the readers will act upon the advice.

THE Winsted, Conn., Press describes THE TRUTH SEEKER as "a New York religious paper, devoted to the dissemination of the purest unsectarian religious teachings." We trust that now good Christians will no longer object to our pictures.

JOHN GEORGE HERTWIG, an occasional contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER, has begun at Washington, D. C., the publication of the American Weekly. It is principally devoted to the discussion of national finance and taxation. The price of the Weekly is two dollars per annum.

THE premises occupied by the London Freethinker were destroyed by fire July 30th. However, the paper for the week was printed, and there will be no suspension, as a plant elsewhere has been secured. About all of the Freethinker's stock of books were destroyed. The stock was insured, but, taking advantage of a legal technicality, the insurance company refuses to pay. Mr. Foote will sue for his money, and in the mean time his friends are raising a subscription to help him.

THE Democrat, of Clearfield, Pa., says:

"While walking down Second street the other day we saw two boys aged about nine years studiously poring over the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER. If the parents of these children hav any respect for their offspring, they should keep such literature out of their hands."

If the Democrat will show any children who hav been injured by their reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we will grant that it has some basis for its slur. Otherwise we must put the insult down to the account of Christian intolerance.

A PRIEST of the Episcopalian church, a graduate of the highest designation, and a man of unexceptionable character, has become so indignant at the outrage on Mr. Reynolds at Boonton that he has made a solemn determination that he will never again enter the portals of any Christian place of worship whatever. We are not authorized to publish his name, and prefer to leave the matter to himself, being assured that in due time he will come out. This priest is not an Atheist. He is not the Rev. Heber Newton, but one of a much higher academic standing. He has finally, after many struggles, made up his mind to consider the Christian system a fraud without a redeeming quality.

THE Boonton, N. J., Bulletin says:

"E. M. Macdonald, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, says that Reynolds's tent was 'wrecked by Catholic and Methodist roughs.' A man who gets so far from the truth as this when 'seeking the truth,' is not a good 'seeker.'"

We judge by the comment appended that the Bulletin questions the accuracy of our statement. The facts are these. James Neafie, one of the men arrested for rioting, was formerly a steady attendant upon Methodist services. At present he divides his piety between the Methodist and the Reformed church. He is a little more Methodist than Reformed. When H. G. Randall, another arrested rioter, moved to Boonton, he brought to the pastor of the Methodist church of Boonton a letter from the Methodist church of the town which he had left. These facts we obtained from the editor of the Boonton Bulletin. George Hyler, the coachman who was arrested, is also a Methodist. All these men are charged with inciting to riot, and Mr. Reynolds knows that they did take part in the partial destruction of the tent by urging the rough element, who are mostly members of the Catholic church, to run Mr. Reynolds out of town. If it were not Catholic and Methodist roughs who wrecked the tent, we do not know who is guilty. Certainly the tent was not wrecked by Catholic and Methodist gentlemen.

GROSS sectarian superstition would seem to hav reached the limit in the action of the Protestant and Catholic church authorities at the recent explosion of a powder mill, wherein eleven men were blown to atoms in a moment. A correspondent of the Evening Post reports that all that could be found of the unfortunate creatures was four or five pounds of flesh, and adds: "As part of the men were Catholic and part Protestant, the mass was divided and put into two coffins, funeral services being held over one according to the Catholic ritual, and over the other according to the Protestant."

THE Christian Advocate prints a "children's temperance" battle-hymn, of which the following is the closing stanza:

"Hark! how the conflict rages
For Temperance, Truth, and Law!
We're writing History's pages,
Hurrah for Right! Hurrah!
Jehovah is our captain,
This war is all his own;
On earth we'll fight his battles,
Then sing around his throne."

We would like to ask how much "temperance" there is about a sentiment of that sort. A person who could sing it and believe it would be as badly intoxicated in one way as he could be in another if rum were plenty and free as water. It is a moral crime to indoctrinate children with these militant notions.

MR. D. A. BLODGETT, of Grand Rapids, Mich., is again employed at his good work. He has engaged Charles Watts to deliver a course of four lectures at the Opera House, beginning Sept. 29th and closing Oct. 3d. The work of Liberalizing Grand Rapids is peculiarly Mr. Blodgett's own. Being a gentleman of large wealth, he can afford to hire the best hall in town and pay speakers and advertising bills, and his social position is such that the inhabitants of the city are bound to listen to him and the speakers he engages. Every year Mr. Blodgett has employed several Freethought speakers, and the people of Grand Rapids hav packed the large Opera House to listen to them. By these means Grand Rapids has become about the most Liberal city in the West, and the progress of the general public has forced the denominational preachers to expand their several mental horizons. Lecturers who hav been there report that intellectually Grand Rapids is wide awake and still opening its eyes. For this she is chiefly indebted to our friend Blodgett. If in each town and city of the United States there was but one man with the disposition and means of Mr. Blodgett, another decade would see an enormous transformation in the intellectual and moral status of the people. Four or five such men would soon turn the churches into academies and the Sunday-schools into kindergartens.

IT was once a favorit method of disciplin with the father abbots to wall in a refractory monk and leave him to such meditations as might occur to a dying man. Being surrounded by air-tight stone and mortar, his minutes were few. Everybody supposes that such punishments are no longer used, but a discovery made in Panama the last day of July shows that within a few decades, at least, a monk had been put to death in this way. A theater is being built in Panama on the site of the Los Monjas convent, the outer walls of which are very massiv and will be kept standing. The work now going on is the pulling down of the inner partition walls, which are about twenty-six inches thick. In the course of this work there was discovered within the masonry, in an erect position, a perfect male skeleton, to which was attached a cross made of wood, on which had been an inscription, but it is not legible now. Almost immediately after the discovery the skeleton fell to pieces, and the skull and bones can be seen lying on the ground. The skeleton was found in the wall which was very near the altar. It is a horrible thought that perhaps in this country, perhaps in this very city, live men hav been built into a massiv wall and left to perish. No outsider knows what goes on within the walls of convents and monasteries, and innumerable crimes may be committed that can never reach the public ear. Considering the history of the Catholic church, it might be the part of wisdom and humanity for the state to insist upon knowing a little more about her temporal governments and punishments.

AT an expense of one cent for a postal card, Mr. J. H. Brown, of Annandale, makes us acquainted with the state of his feelings on July 31st:

"ANNANDALE, N. Y., July 31, 1886.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I return THE TRUTH SEEKER with thanks. I hav read it, and had seen a copy of it before. Very likely my name was given you by the party who had it in his house. I do not want it in mine, and my fire is generally started with papers of another kind. Now, I want you Freethinkers all to get together and cause the earth to turn around the other way for a few years. You can certainly do it. There is no power to hinder you, according to your doctrin. Until then,

"Yours respectfully, J. H. BROWN."

If Mr. Brown has read THE TRUTH SEEKER to so little purpose as his words indicate, he has done the best thing possible under the circumstances in sending it back. The cautiousness displayed in not using the paper to start a fire with is commendable. Who knows but that the thing might explode and blow the roof off his domicil? Mr. Brown's first mistake is in supposing that Freethinkers believe they can "cause the earth to turn around the other way." That belief is peculiar to religious people, who, in attributing omnipotence to some God, commit themselvs to the notion that he could at any time "cause the earth to turn around the other way," or both ways at once, for that matter. According to the Christian doctrin that he is a prayer-answering God, Mr. Brown and his fellow-believers are the persons who should control the diurnal motion of our planet. It strikes us that Mr. Brown is something of a numskull, and doesn't know what Freethinkers believe, nor what he believes himself.

MR. PECCI, of the Vatican, Rome, having denounced cremation as a device of the Freemasons and anti-Christians, the Masonic lodge La Razione, of Milan, resolves that it, "in consequence of the deliberate vote of the holy Roman Inquisition, condemning and prohibiting cremation, deeming it highly honorable to Freemasonry that the pontiff should attribute to its influence a work of hygiene and civilization, invites the Grand Orient of Italy to urge all the lodges to inaugurate associations for cremation, and to erect cremating temples."

WHEN Mr. Reynolds was in Boonton, N. J., with his tent, preaching the gospel of honesty, a camp-meeting of colored Christians was also in session. The Rev. Josiah King, colored, was pastor in charge. He was aided by several black reverends and singers. Posters were out all over the town beseeching the white Christians to help their colored brethren by financial donations, and all who loved Christ and Christianity were invited to attend the services. The meeting closed August 8th. How much money was contributed is not known. But just so much as was contributed did the pastor in charge abscond with on Monday morning, August 9th, by the first train out of Boonton. The singers and helpers were left without money to pay their grocery bills or to buy railroad tickets. The Methodist grocer nearest the "Witch Grounds," which is the local name for the woods where the camp was pitched, bewails the loss of many dollars, and his confidence in colored Christianity is correspondingly lessened. Other tradespeople are considerable sums out of pocket, and if the pastor in charge is ever laid hold of by the Boonton Christians his life will be made unpleasant. About the only person in Boonton who views with satisfaction his connection with the colored Christians is Charles Booth, one of the Infidel boys of the cutlery manufacturing family. He attended one of the meetings when the Rev. Mr. Stewart held forth. Mr. Stewart enlarged upon the great faith he himself had in Jesus, and entreated others to share his faith. "Wy, bredrin," he said, "I doan know whar I'se to git de nex' meal. I hain't had enny brekfust, an' I doan know no more dan nuthin' whar I'se to git my dinner. But de bressed Lord Jesus will provide." None of the white Christians present seemed to believe the preacher, or at least none of them offered to be the chosen instrument of Jesus in filling him up, so Charles Booth stepped forward and told him if he was hungry to come with him. Evidently the darkey was honest in his statement, for he promptly put on his hat and followed his host to the Booth mansion, where he was fed to such an extent that it was with great difficulty he succeeded in mounting the pulpit for his next sermon. The Methodists who dealt with the colored folks may mourn their loss. But Charley Booth is happy, for he fed the defrauded when the Christians passed by on the other side of the road.

IN the following letter to his bishop, Cardinal Taschereau, of Quebec, has made plain the position of the Roman Catholic church toward the Knights of Labor:

"YOUR LORDSHIP: On the 13th of May last I represented to his eminence the Cardinal Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda the divergencies of opinion expressed by the newspapers of Canada and the United States on the subject of the society of the Knights of Labor condemned in September, 1884. As it was pretended that the effect of this sentence stood suspended by an appeal affirmed to hav been carried before the holy see after modifications had been made in the constitution of this society, I begged his eminence to make known with certainty the position of the church in regard to it. A letter from his eminence Cardinal Simeoni, dated the 12th of July, informs me that on the 27th of June last the Sacred Office, after a re-exaauination of the question, maintained its judgment of 1884 absolutely in the same terms, which are reproduced in his letter, as follows:

"'Considering the principles, organization, and rules of the society of the Knights of Labor as they are set forth, this society must be classed among those which hav been condemned according to the instructions of this Supreme Congregation on the 10th of May, 1884, that the bishops be enjoined to proceed as well against this society as against others of the same kind, and to employ the remedies ordered or advised in said instructions.'

"Your lordship will recall that in my consultation of the 5th of October, 1883, I made no representation of my own upon the principles of the organization and the rules of the society, but I purely and simply transmitted to the holy see an authentic printed copy of its constitution, with a prayer to examin it all the more carefully because this society seemed to embrace all branches of work and workers, which, moreover, its name clearly indicated. The pretended appeal to the holy see has been long invoked to create the belief that, pending the final decision, persons could continue to enroll themselvs or to remain in the society, provided always that they were sincerely disposed to obey the final sentence upon the appeal. If that appeal had been really made it is impossible that the Sacred Office should not hav been seized of it, because this matter belongs to its exclusiv resort. Consequently, the decision of the 27th of June communicated to me by his eminence Cardinal Simeoni, is in reply to it. The original sentence has been confirmed in its form and tenor. Whereas, in this last decision, as in the first, the Holy Office recommends the bishops to proceed against this society in the manner prescribed in its instructions of the 10th of May, 1884, I cannot see that there can any longer be any doubt as to the rule to be followed by the Catholics of the whole world over whom the jurisdiction of that Sacred Congregation extends.

"Having discharged my duty in conveying to your lordship this decision of the holy see, I beg you to accept assurances of my devotion.

"E. A. CAR. TASCHEREAU,
"Archbishop of Quebec."

While the condemnation is universal, with the duplicity characteristic of the Catholic authorities it is only applied, so far, to Canada. In this country the church will probably use the order instead of abusing it.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 for Tent Fund. I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that the meek and lowly Christians in New Jersey are forgetting their calling. T. R. BURROWS.

MOUNT UNION, O., Aug. 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find money order for $5, which place to my credit and send on THE TRUTH SEEKER with the pictures, for I expect to take it as long as I liv. .

WM. ANTRAM.

BEVERLY, N. J., August 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Five dollars inclosed is for Mr. Reynolds to keep the Tent moving. You will get the Beverly Banner. It has some hard words for Mr. Reynolds. It is run by Prof. Streeter Fleet, also of the Normal School and the M. E. church here. He is a first-class bigot and blackguard. WM. KRIM.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Aug. 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find stamps for another subscription. The telling cartoons hav done it. When one hits a Catholic, the Protestants want it; when a Presbyterian gets a rap, it suits the Methodist; and thus it goes through the whole list. Even half-fledged Liberals will read a picture when they would not peruse a wordy article. The one on church taxation touched their pockets, which is the most sensitiv part of them. Keep up the cartoons if you must raise the price of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER.

CEDAR DALE, August 1, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Many thanks for your kindness in forwarding the paper so long after the subscription expired. Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes" are fully worth the price of the paper. As we read, it almost seems to carry us close to wonderland or Yellowstone Park. The illustrations are grand—the more so as they picture to our minds the ignorance and superstition of ancient and, I may say also, modern times. Keep the ball rolling until every stronghold is shattered, and we can see every dogma crushed to atoms.

BOZEMAN, M. T., Aug. 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: As your readers know, Mr. S. P. Putnam has come and gone. He made a very favorable impression here, though he had great odds to contend against. All of the Methodist Episcopal ministers of the territory and some from the states were here at the time holding camp-meeting and conference. The conference of the Methodist Episcopal South is to be held at this place in a few days. I am informed that Sam Jones will be present. How they do work to "hold the fort!" Our new (not yet finished) Baptist church was considerably wrecked the other day by lightning.

LINCOLN, ILL., Aug 1, 1886.

TO THE BRETHREN: I hav just been reading the Apochryphal New Testament, and also its history, ably and thoroughly edited. The account of the plan of separating the various books that were presented and wrangled over by the priests of Alexandria, and elsewhere, is certainly unique. Every priest wanted to put in a book of gospels, and there were so many books that many of the priests thought that there would be too much gospel, and that some of the books must go. So a compromise was reached by placing all under the table, and the "heavenly father," who sat by helplessly looking on at his holy word, was besought to put the genuin ones on the table. It is received as history now that the true books were placed on top, and the false ones were left under. Those rejected had long been used by the early church as God's word, and it created a commotion when the Apochryphal books were left. After reading the Apochryphal books and comparing them with the "genuin," I am reminded of the story I read of a Yankee at Cape Cod. He invented a machine to separate the bones and meat of cooked fish. Sitting at table one day, and placing his mouth to receive the boneless fish, he turned the crank the wrong way and filled his mouth with bones! Now, reader, get the Apochryphal, and you will think that God turned the crank the wrong way, and threw the bones on the table!

When I read and study the various religions that hav afflicted mankind, as far as known to history, and compare them with the religion of Jesus, I am reminded of Old Abe. Soon after he signed the emancipation proclamation, some curiosity hunter went to him and said, "Mr. Lincoln, I should very much like to get the pen with which you signed the proclamation." Looking toward the inkstand, he said, "Well, really, I can't say now; it was one of a lot, and they are all alike."

AT HOME, ELLIS CO., TEXAS, July 23, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been waiting a long time to write, and you hav no doubt waited until all hope of ever hearing from me has vanished. I would offer some excuse for not responding before now, but hav none that would justify such long delay—poverty (I hate it), inconvenience, and neglect. In this you will at last get $3.25, which I recollect to be the amount I owe you. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER well. I was brought up under strict orthodox rules; joined the church, of course, when a boy; wore out my religion about the close of the war; then joined the Baptist in '74; tried to do all the duties of a first-class Christian; filled a deacon's place some years; was a favorit among them. In the fall of '80 I mentally compared faith and credulity with reason and science, and, of course, I soon found my faith wavering but reason advancing, and I saw nor felt any evidence of divine displeasure. So I went on with the thinking, and by chance my young friend Burnett got a copy of Paine's "Age of Reason." We read, reasoned, thought, and talked freely. The result was that at the December meeting of '80 we both went up and accused ourselvs of heresy. (Good thing for us 'twas the nineteenth century). Well, I couldn't tell you half. All were amazed; would not turn to us out, but prayed for us and sent some brethren to talk to us, but we talked more to them than they to us. This went on for some time, and one good brother said 'twas no use to send committees to us, for we would out-talk any they could send. In February following, N. T. Smith, their clerk, went up and stated that he had passed from the darkness of faith and superstition to the light and liberty of Freethought. Then they excommunicated all three of us at once and consigned us to the fierce anger of a very merciful and loving God. Their next step was one of wanton persecution. In July of the same year they expelled me from the Masonic Lodge on the charge of heresy. Still, I pursue the even tenor of my way in the full enjoyment of free thought and speech, not fearing but deriding hell.

PENN YAN, N. Y., Aug. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: My dictionary defines religion to be "any system of faith and worship." If this definition of the term be correct, then Mohammedanism, Buddhism, and all other systems of faith and worship are just as much religion as Christianity. Most people confound religion with morality, whereas they are totally and distinctly different from each other, having no necessary connection. Religion is one thing, and morality is another and a very different thing. Religion is merely a system of faith and worship; morality is the observance and practice of the duties of life. Religion is bigoted, intolerant, and proscriptiv; morality is liberal, tolerant, and charitable. Religion is fierce and vehement; morality is calm and deliberate. Religion persecutes, while morality protects. "All things ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them," is not religion, but morality. To "visit the fatherless and the widows in their affliction" is not religion, but morality. To "loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke; to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house; when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him," is not religion, but morality. Religion is inimical to freedom; morality defends the rights of man. Religion has been the cause of more misery and tribulation to mankind than all other sources combined. Morality has been, and still is, the true source of all that is good, great, and noble among men. In short, religion is a superstition, nothing more nor less; morality is a truism, and rests upon a basis as firm and impregnable as the eternal hills. We need more morality, and less religion, which consists entirely of forms and ceremonies. We want the practical more than the theoretical. Morality is salvation.

Know then this truth, enough for man to know,
Virtue alone is happiness below;
The only point where human bliss stands still,
And tastes the good without the fall to ill.

DEOATUR, ILL., July 31, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It will no doubt be said by many of your readers, after having read my letter concerning a tract fund, which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER this week, that it is very easy to make suggestions, but to lend financial aid is another thing.

Yes, it is quite easy to offer suggestions, I am well aware, and it is equally impossible for some to do anything financially, and you can justly assign me to that class.

But, since writing my first letter upon this subject, I hav been reminded of my having on hand, at present, nine hundred copies of my chart entitled, "The Encounter of Adam and Eve with the Serpent in the Garden."

These charts are 14x17 inches in dimension, and the press-work and material upon which they are printed are of the best.

The charts hav a broad margin, and are designed to be framed.

Now, I desire to donate this edition of nine hundred charts to the tract fund.

Let ever reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER send twelve cents to its editor for a copy of this chart.

In this way, the reader will be getting the worth of his money, and at the same time will be assisting the Liberal cause in a way that will prove a never-ending success. I will keep the Truth Seeker Company well supplied with the charts, and they can supply all sending for them.

THE TRUTH SEEKER can make a report of all money received for this purpose once a week, if space allows.

Now, brother Liberals, I know the times are hard, but just set a resolution to donate twelve cents to our cause by sending for one or a dozen charts. This edition ought to be cleaned out in one month, which would of itself place about one hundred dollars in the treasury.

The Truth Seeker Company should publish all the tracts, and pay itself out of the money received for that purpose, and make a report of everything pertaining to the business as often as once a month.

I now leave this matter to the candid consideration of yourselvs and readers.

M. L. SANDERS.

MAITLAND, MO., Aug. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In running over the St. Joseph Evening News the other day, I found the following: "Rev. Dr. R. Morris has just read an essay to the London Philological Society on the etymology of the word God. He thinks that it means 'thunder,' and is derived from the Sanscrit gu, which means 'to sound,' and is allied to gora, which means 'terrible.'—Chicago Times."

How our ideas will occasionally be upset! We Liberals hav always claimed that the Christians knew nothing abou the God of whom they are wont to prate, but, if this Dr. Morris be correct, they do know a good deal about him. And again, on second thought, their ignorance shines out with its usual brilliancy, from the fact that they did not know him when he did come around on his throne of black cloud, thunder-head, and whirling tornado, and instead of rushing to meet him as loving, confiding children should, they skipped for the cellar or cave. Just think how, for the last two thousand years, they hav been telling us all about God, how well they knew him, their intimacy giving them such an insight of his plans and intentions that they could delineate them to us, even down to the effect that our thoughts would hav upon him, and what his actions would be toward us for having them, even to the emergency of their being expressed or non-expressed ideas; and how we are now forced to blush for their stupidity from learning that he has been all this time (and for untold ages before) growling, grumbling, rumbling, roaring, and crashing about them every few days, and they knew him not. How wondrous strange, and what a lost set of heavenly "kids" they hav been!

And what a messenger of glad tidings this discovery of Rev. Dr. Morris for the Godless (thunderless). As usual, new discoveries help them, and this one especially so. For hav we not always been taught that to escape the presence and vengeauce of God was impossible?

Now, if Morris be correct, all you hav to do is to board a Pacific-bound train, and in three, four, or five days, you are across the "Rockies," and in that delightful region where he, God (thunder), is utterly unknown, and bask in that world-renowned country, and enjoy all the luxuries of climate and soil, and reflect that so much of the truly good and beautiful of this world is godless (thunderless). But even this immigration is unnecessary, for science has taught us that he (God—thunder) is utterly harmless, and that the malicious shafts of priestly design and tyranny are the only things about the Christian God to be dreaded; and as she (science) has been the means of enabling us to ward off the electric shock, so she is becoming equally powerful in defending us against this Christian electricity, and rendering their crashing, roaring God, who follows the priestly lightning, of no consequence whatever.

(Revised according to the Rev. Dr. Morris.)
And now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the thunder my soul to keep,
And if I die before I wake,
I pray the thunder my soul to take.

Yours, etc., DR. H. B. MAXWELL.

BURR OAK, August 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I pledged my mite last fall, at Cleveland, to the lecturing fund, and redeemed the same in due time. I now wish to send to one of reason's and truth's ablest and best exponents, C. B. Reynolds, to cheer and encourage him to persevere in his arduous work of tearing down the stronghold of superstition and error, my hearty good-speed, and a little substantial aid in the form of $3. I hope many are able and willing, and will do much better. And, as I cannot see by his letters in THE TRUTH SEEKRE when and where I might send direct to him, I send the same to you, hoping you will tax yourself with the necessary trouble to send it him at your earliest convenience.

Now, I wish to say something through the columns of the Liberal's Bible, THE TRUTH SEEKER, about wheat turning to chess; as the question, Will wheat turn to chess? was asked by some one in said paper some time since, and answered editorially in an unqualified No—as though there was no doubt of that fact—which was erroneous in the extreme, as the affirmativ Yes can be used with perfect truth and knowledge; just as much as if the question was, Will wheat produce wheat? I know one to be a fact, just as well as the other, and farming has been my occupation all my life, and wheat has been my main crop for more than half a century.

Some forty-five or fifty years ago, I fed a bundle of as clean and pure wheat as was ever tied up, to a friend's horse in the fence-corner of the harvest field, a portion of which remained upon the ground among the wild grass, which grew up so thick it could not thrive much, but headed out the next summer a stunted mass of chess—all chess and no wheat.

Now for proof No. 2: I raised fifteen acres of barley one year, on new and clean ground, whereon there had never been wheat or chess. The season being a very dry one, the barley made but a very short growth of straw, and the ground being rough I could not avoid leaving quite a quantity on the ground. I desired to put the same piece into wheat that fall, and plowed six acres on one side of the same before the barley left on the ground had a chance to grow, expecting to plow it again. The barley so plowed under soon came up, and made a vigorous growth. The balance of the field was not plowed until the barley was eaten up by stock, or grew so when that ground was plowed it killed it; and in the fall and seed-time, as I was pressed with work and somewhat inexperienced in thorough farming, I sowed the whole field crossways of both parts, giving that part plowed first some extra harrowing. I used clean seed, but a large share of the barley on the first plowing continued to liv and grow through a long and wet fall, choking and stunting the wheat not a little. The winter, of course, killed the barley. The wheat was all alive in the spring, though not so large as that on the other ground beside it, but it came on, and made a full crop of straw; but behold, fully nineteen-twentieths of it proved to be chess! The balance of the field bore as clean and nice a crop of wheat as ever need to grow, while the six acres of the same seed choked by barley was not worth harvesting, it being next to all chess.

Proof third: Many times on my farm—and I hav often heard others say the same thing occurred on their farms, which is no more or less than there being a row of chess between the standing wheat in a field and a little sag, or low spot, where the water had stood and killed the wheat. The chess, being the wheat plants at the edge of the pond damaged by water and freezing, though not entirely killed, was damaged so it grew chess instead of wheat. No other chess, or next to none, in the field.

Now, I hav given the three above proofs (samples of many others I might giv, but I forbear), which fully establishes one of two things, beyond all peradventure (there are no "ifs" or "ands" about it), which is that wheat will, under certain conditions and maltreatment, turn to chess, or I hav foolishly and wilfully misrepresented facts.

M. P. THURSTON.

[Possibly Brother Thurston is correct in regard to the identity of wheat and chess, but botanists do not agree with him. Chess (Bromus secalinus) is described as a kind of grass. It may be degenerate wheat. Anyway, if it bears no relation to wheat, it is at least singular that it should be found growing with that kind of grain, and nowhere else.—ED. T. S.]

CLEVELAND, O., Aug. 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am happy to say that THE TRUTH SEEKER has quite a number of friends in the Forest city. Though I hav but recently become a reader of your excellent paper, which I get through a newsdealer, I would not miss a single number, not even if I had to pay a dollar for a copy. I would like to see the number of your subscribers doubled in this city. We hav several churches and some religious charitable(?) institutions here.

I would like to say a few words in reference to the way in which things are managed at the institution known as the "Garden Street Charity Hospital," which may be of interest to some charitably-disposed persons who giv money for the support of such places. The Garden Street Hospital in Cleveland is in charge of a number of ladies known as Sisters of Charity, and these ladies solicit alms for the hospital from the public. The soliciting is generally accompanied by the remark that "although the institution is a Catholic one, they make no distinction between the applicants for admission." It has also been stated that no one has ever been charged anything for the services rendered them in the hospital, but they can make contributions of any amount they like after they get well. But what delights the people who run this concern most of all is to hav a chance to save the soul of "a Chinaman or any other kind of heathen."

Now, all this is very nice, and it is consoling to the people of Cleveland to know that the poor and friendless hav such kind friends to watch over them and care for them, and no one need ever die or want medical attendance and care, and, above all, the soul-saving business will be done with neatness and dispatch.

Now, let your readers look at the following story, and I think they will doubt these statements about the "charity," and the "soul-saving," and the "heathen."

Last January a young man came to this place in search of work. He was a stranger, in a strange land, but he secured work here, and everything would hav gone well if he had not been stricken down with sickness four weeks after his arrival. For months he struggled until his last dollar was gone, and then he applied for admission to the hospitals, but he was informed that they had all the charity inmates they could afford to keep. Then he applied to the city infirmary, but would not be admitted there because he was not a citizen. In despair, on the last fourth of July, he painfully made his way to that temple of charity on Garden street, where the poor, and the afflicted, and the heathen are cared for without money and without price. He was told he would be admitted on payment of $6 a week, and when he stated his case, and told them he was not able to do so, further consideration of the matter was deemed necessary. After a couple of hours' waiting, he was told that, "as he had already employed another doctor, they could not admit him." With this remark, those charitable (?) Christian people sent him staggering from their door, blind and delirious with pain and weakness.

But friends were near to help him, and they were not professing Christians either. That remark about employing another doctor was all bosh. It would hav made no difference how many doctors he had previously employed if he had money to pay for what the public had already paid for, or rather that had been taken from them under false pretenses, for no poor person, I hav since learned, is admitted there unless a member in good standing of the Catholic church.

HARRY DANVERS.

MIDDLEBURY, IND., Aug. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The apparent enlargement of the moon near the horizon is simply an optical delusion. It may be classed among the many deceptions of nature. There are myriads of deceptions of all kinds, on very hand, from protozoan or polyp up to man; from the tireless and forever invisible atoms up to the restless, whirling orbs. The knowledge derived through the eye alone is often very unreliable. The sun is never where it seems to be, never rises or sets. The stars never twinkle, or neither do they retain what is called their "relativ distances" during two consecutiv seconds. Nothing in nature is at rest, nothing ever was at rest, and consequently never will be; nothing destroyed, for matter, like space and time, is eternal; nothing new, for all matter is eternally old. Nor has this deceptiv organ, the eye, really ever seen anything; not even one of the countless millions of objects throughout the unlimited universe from atom to Alcyon. The unaided eye alone never once hints of the existence of the teeming denizens in a single drop of apparently pure water; it furnishes no clue to the billions of billions of animalculæ in our atmosphere, floating on every breeze, and drawn in at every breath. Again, it would pronounce many objects on our little earth many times larger than the largest sphere in space. And yet what is our globe itself save a revolving, animated atom, beside great orbs like Sirius, Procyon, Regulus, and Alcyon, whose magnitude in the far-off realms of space surpasses our little world as the dazzling glare of the electric light does the flickering wax taper of ages and ages ago?

The unaided eye alone tells us no more about the wonderful bioplasts that so ingeniously rebuild every organ of the body than we now know of the interior of Jupiter or Polaris, or the exterior of an undiscovered planet beyond Neptune. All the other senses are required to watch this, the most deceptiv organ in the human body. Hence it should never be allowed alone, but that is just what we do when we look at the moon. If we measure the moon's apparent diameter with any suitable instrument, we shall find that it subtends a less angle near the horizon than when near the zenith. We are actually something like four thousand miles nearer the moon when it is on our meridian, that is, we are about one-sixtieth near the moon than we were when it first rose. This increases its diameter more than one-half a minute. The moon then is actually nearer, and, consequently, apparently larger when in the zenith. Our judgment of the absolute magnitude of any object is based on our judgment of its distance. If two objects at unequal distances appear the same size, the more distant one must be the larger. Now the moon, when nearer the horizon, appears to us more distant than when near the zenith. She appears more distant for two reason, viz., comparison with intervening objects and diminished brightness. When the moon is on our meridian no objects intervene, and there is consequently no comparison possible. Hence she appears quite near, for the same reason several miles appear as one at sea, and the vault of the heavens does not present the appearance of a hemisphere, but appears flattened at the zenith and spread out at the horizon.

Again, our estimate of the distance of objects is also affected by their brightness. Thus, a distant mountain, seen through a perfectly clear atmosphere, appears much nearer than when seen through an atmosphere that is hazy. But what are all those delusions combined when compared with the delusions, superstitions, and absurdities of the far-away ancients that are still handed down to us as golden truth, that still hav a firm foothold on the mind of man?

M. R. TEESDALE.

ALDERSON, W. VA., July 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In order that you may assure the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that Freethought is not a dead letter in West Virginia, I herewith transmit you a copy of a letter recently mailed to an Episcopal minister until lately pastor of a church here, who in delivering his last sermon at this place commanded those in the congregation, if there were any, "who did not believe Christ was the son of God, or in the divine inspiration of the Bible, to stand up." The occasion which precipitated this unusual act by this good man is believed to be my having exhibited among some of his flock a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and one displaying a cartoon of Jonah and the whale, which, like all other Bible stories, is not equalled in absurdity and childish nonsense by even the exploits of "Sindbad the Sailor," or of Jules Verne in his "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," and "Around the World in Eighty Days." You are at liberty to publish these letters if you think it would enhance the cause of Liberalism, or tend in the least to dissipate the clouds of superstition and ignorance which possess the public mind upon this question. For the pittance inclosed send me a copy of "St. Matthew Before the Court," and also a copy of the next issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. W. A. BROWNING.

THE LETTER.

ALDERSON, W. VA., July 26, 1886.

REV. ——: When preaching your last sermon here you invited, or rather commanded, those in the congregation, if there were such, who did not believe "Christ was the son of God" to stand up. As there are a number of persons who believe you referred to me, knowing the cap fits me, I deem it my duty to furnish you the reasons which actuate me in the entertainment of sentiments so widely at variance with your own. To that end I shall to-day mail to your address a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, not on account of the cartoons it displays, nor for the purpose of wounding your feelings, but to call your attention to various advertised works in the interest of Freethought, which if you were to send for and read carefully, and, as you would say, prayerfully also, would enable you to understand the reasons which I refer to, and why many eminent divines hav left the pulpit, are members of the Secular Society, and are now preaching Freethought, and why the most thoughtful people are losing interest in the church; and also enable you to see, as we see, the "hand-writing on the wall" for the Christian system, which, apart from the many murders committed in its name, and by its authority, may hav served a benign purpose in its day. But that day has passed; its deformity, its barbarism, its absurdity cannot withstand the intellectual light of this century. The time is not far distant when it will become as dead as the Sanscrit language.

The Bible will be relegated to the back-shelf to be preserved as only a mere literary curiosity, which, instead of being the word of a God, is only the word of wicked men—Jewish and Catholic priests, who in complot with the kings of their time invented this hierarchy for the further enslavement of the people. Read the marked pieces, and also the two tracts which we shall soon send you, and learn therefrom that both the Old and New Testaments are forgeries; the former by the Jewish priest Esdras and a quorum of assistants, who, in company with King Artaxerces, wrote the Pentateuch two hundred years after the Hebrew writings, the law, had been destroyed by fire with the temple when Jerusalem was burnt by Nebuchadnezzar, and 334 years after the reputed death of Moses, who was only an oriental myth, the Buddha, the Brahma, or the Crishna of the Jewish system. The time has passed when opposition can be silenced by persecution or priestly anathemas—threatenings of everlasting burnings or by the repetition of stale platitudes in the endeavor to impress a sickly sentimentality, which is the chief characteristic of the average sermon. The issue must be met without evasion—no dodging. Statement against statement, fact against fact, argument against argument, and a fair and open concussion of thought with thought must decide the issue which has been joined by the great intellectual luminaries of the world. Thoughtful men and women will no longer remain fettered by the hypocritical cant of the priest, echoed by the clergy, that it is sinful to use reason in the decision of this question, or to learn what is said by the great apostles of Liberalism in their laudable effort to rid the world of superstition and ignorance, which are twin sisters, and the only means by which church memberships are kept in line, and its votaries induced to believe their theories a success, and that it will be universally accepted, when the truth is, thoughtful men and women everywhere scout it as a delusion and a farce.

W. A. BROWNING.

SOUTH BARRE, N. Y., July 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: As ex-President Arthur and others say, by the inscrutable wisdom of God, or some other cause, most likely broken laws, we hav been flat on our back for many days with rheumatism, but now just able to sit up. We respond to your wants by inclosing $5, as per your suggestion, which takes us through another year. We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from its birth, and when we do not want it will let you know. The cartoons hav wed me more closely to it than before. If God ever wrote the Bible and then sent men to preach it, in my opinion he also has ordained Watson Heston to illustrate it. Of course, now and then some good brother will kick, and perhaps in kicking he may break the shell that holds his freedom; then he can see more clearly. One brother says occupy the same space in good reading matter. Poor timid soul! he is not afraid of the pictures, only he is afraid of popularity or the society where he livs. No written language, in my opinion, is their equal, and my motto is, "Long liv Watson." The few that may stop the paper for a time remind me of what the Dutchman said when a new "breacher" came to town, and among other things said Jesus Christ was dead. At first it made the Dutchman's son feel very bad, but the old man consoled him by saying, "Shacob, my boy, never mind the son as long as the old man be alive." So, we say, to every one the cartoons kill, ten will come to their funeral.

Friend Eugene, in reviewing Mr. Talmage on monopoly we are both pleased and displeased—pleased because he says some great and good truths—namely, "The scepter of monopoly is made of the iron rail track and the wire of telegraphy;" again, "Great monopolies in any land imply great privation and wretchedness. Monopoly, brazen-faced, iron-fingered, and vulture-hearted monopoly, offers its hand to this republic." Now all this is quite true, and why not stop with the truth? But no; a little further on this Rev. D.D., or Doctor of Deviltry, says, "Another suitor for the hand of this nation is Infidelity." Then he makes all Infidels Anarchists, and says one of their chief leaders was recently pulled from under a bed by the leg in a house of ill-fame. Lucky, we think, not to hav been pulled from in the bed, where so many reverends are being pulled from in the recent past, if half the statements are true. Satan should not rebuke sin. A word to the wise, we hope, is sufficient.

But, again, the opportunity is too rich to be lost just at the time when all the world of thought is awake to all that may be said on the great labor question. This wonderful, worthy Rev. D.D., which many translate Doctor of Deviltry, in looking over Chicago's recent misfortune, says the police, in exploring the dens of Anarchists, found dynamite, vitrol, and Tom Paine's "Age of Reason," etc., but nary Testament or copy of Watts's Hymn Book that teaches, "Hark! from the tomb a doleful sound," etc.; a Testament that teaches "believe or be damned," and "I came not to bring peace but a sword," which its teachers hav fully carried out. Thus all can see another vain attempt to scandalize a little volume that, with its author, did more to establish freedom of thought and and liberty to express it than all the Bibles ever written in all ages, and by all men; and all Bibles hav been thus written. Yes, this same Doctor of Deviltry takes the very liberty that Paine did so much to establish to attack the author.

Well, the poor pitiable D.D. makes one more thrust and then expires. He says this book, the Testament, of course, is what brought George Washington on his knees at Valley Forge. Why, Brother Talmage, did you not add the story of the hatchet, or did you forget it? Now, suppose George went on his knees at Valley Forge (which many doubt), do you think it did as much good for our poor hungry, naked, and suffering soldiers as what Thomas Paine really did by his own voluntary act? The boys, or soldiers, at Valley Forge in midwinter were in great want for food and clothing, and finally concluded to break camp for a time. Paine saw the bad result, as he thought, and so from his own means supplied the soldiers by two loaded teams with some comforts in camp. Now we leave it to the general reader to say which is ahead, prayer or provender? For my part, since the effort for Garfield we hav lost all hope in prayer, and believe the quicker we help ourselvs the better. Now, on the whole, we can't see that much has come from the dear brother in the Lord to us laboring class; he is only at war with monopoly, not with capital. He says, "All would be rich if they could." Also, "Get all you can honestly," forgetting there are as many kinds of honor as men. So we must shut our eyes, join the church, pay the priest, and all go to sheol. Let us pray! M. B. DELANO.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Under the Trees.

I walked in a grove a midsummer day
Where a thousand birds are coming to stay,
And the branches meet and cover the way,
Though the place was a desert but yesterday.

And flowers and flowers are blooming to gild,
And nests and nests the mother-birds build,
While the grass grows rank as a thing self-willed,
And summer's chalice its sweetness spilled.

All over and under the shimmering trees
That we planted for children and birds and bees
And wild, weird winds and the days like these
When the fierce suns burn through the summer's breeze

Is a gay, glad song that is nature's own,
And the turtle-dove with her tender moan—
But the sweetest song that the woods hav known
Is childhood's careless, happy tone.

The catalpa-tree in her green umbrell'
Four blue eggs hid that I love as well
As in morning days in the hazel dell
When a sheen of sky o'er the meadows fell.

Now the mustard opens her cups of gold,
And the bee bears home what her legs will hold.
Though anear the wheels of the spider rolled,
The bee knew more than her honey-bags told.

Softly turning her silver reels
Over and under the silver wheels
And the silken web that her loom conceals,
Is the spider's raft that the morn reveals.

Weaving her bars and slender bands,
And never a shuttle slips in her hands;
Hither and thither the fleecy strands
Till she shames the weaver of orient lands.

All over and under her lines she drew,
And each one, threading the bells of dew,
Made a net of pearls no brown bee knew
Since she found plenty of work to do.

Pray listen, children, pretty and sweet,
From your golden curls to your dancing feet.
The worker has often some honey to eat
If he shuns the ways where the idlers meet,

And the silver wheels be rolled in vain,
Though fair they be in the dewy rain;
'Tis only the fly is caught in the train,
Whose feet and wings are much of his brain.

Away with the wheel like a shining star,
And the tangled wings, and the woven bar—
No moral* shall come to make or mar
These sylvan scenes where the children are.

Clearwater, Neb. Mary Baird Finch.

*I once knew a little girl who said she hated a story with a moral. If there are any little readers like her in the Children's Corner, let these lines be inscribed to them.

My Visit to Crystal Mountain.

Crystal Mountain is about twenty miles south, and in the main range which lies to the west of Canyon City. It is the main range, from which the Arkansas river emerges, forming the Grand Canyon, or Royal Gorge, at the mouth of which Canyon City is located. It is about eight thousand feet above the level of the sea, and about three thousand feet above Canyon City.

Orion my brother, Lula my sister, and myself started early one bright morning to visit my brother and sister-in-law, who liv on Crystal Mountain. We first crossed Lincoln Park, and between evergreen hills; then across Wolf Park, then over Half-mile Grade, then a little way over level land, passing by Curiosity Hill, which used to be covered with curiosities of many different kinds, such as crystals and petrified stones of endless shapes and forms. But most all of these hav been carried away by tourists.

We then came to the Three-mile Grade, which is graded out of the side of a mountain. Taking pity on the horses, we walked a part of the way up the grade. Having reached the highest peak, we stopped for a moment to gaze on the beauties of sublime nature. Standing on that dizzy hight, gazing at the wild and grand scenery around and below me, I drank deep of the enchanting loveliness. In front of me was a deep, wild glen, while on the opposit side rose lofty mountains covered with dark, thick forest. Starting on again, we followed the winding road down the mountain into what is called the Basin, so called from being surrounded by high mountains. It is really a small valley, and is much the shape of a basin. There we ate our lunch and obtained a drink of nice, cool spring water, the water coming out of a rock.

After resting awhile, we drove on through Oak Creek Canyon, coming into the town of Yorkville, which is at the foot of the west side of the mountain. We passed on and through the town of Galena. We then turned to the east a short distance, when we were at the foot of the mountain. The road from the foot to the top is about two miles long. After riding through woods and over parks, we came to my brother's house or cabin, which is three miles from any neighbor's. We were very tired, and after eating supper we went to bed.

The next day we went into the woods, and sat on the grass, chatting.

The trees looked like giants, and their waving tops appeared as if they touched the sky above. The wild flowers were very gay in their neat little dresses, and the kinnekinnick vine, which spreads over the ground and has a little red berry on it, is very pretty.

The trees in the forest are pine, spruce, and aspen, and grow very large and thrifty.

The flowers and grasses that grow in these forests are very beautiful, and there are three kinds of tree moss, and they are the most lovely I ever saw; one kind is green, and another gray—it has the appearance of a skeleton plant, and, I think, is the most beautiful of all. The other is brown, and shaped like a leaf; it is the next in beauty. When they are put together, they form a beautiful contrast. Then there are different kinds of ground moss. One is brown, and another kind, that grows on the banks of the stream that flows near the woods, is green, and is very pretty when it is in bloom. Its blossoms look like little stars twinkling all over it.

There was a squirrel that attracted my attention in a tree near by. I first heard it chattering, and I looked for a long time, but could not see it. I then saw it on a branch of a pine-tree, by its nest. It had a large nest, made of dry brush and grass. The squirrel was black, and about the size of a chipmunk, and it would jump from branch to branch.

The chipmunk livs in the rocks. It is gray, with a brown stripe down its back. It will peep out very slyly, and if it sees anyone it will dodge back and hide. They are very cunning and mischievous little fellows.

The blue jays would sing and chirp in the trees, and the woodpeckers would keep up such a noise all the time pecking at the trees! By that time it was between daylight and darkness, and the owls began to hoot, and everything in nature was in peaceful repose. So we gathered a few flowers, and started back to the neat cabin that stands near the creek, surrounded by woods. It is a lonesome looking place; not a house in sight—nothing but dark, black woods all around; but a lover of nature finds it pleasant. We sat all the evening a happy group of five; then, with a merry good-night, we retired.

The next morning we went out into the pastures where roam my father's and brother's herd of horses. We strolled along, plucking here and there a wild flower. When we had our hands and aprons full, we sat down beneath the bending boughs of a large pine-tree, where we rested after our long ramble and made bouquets of the flowers we had gathered. On our return to the cabin we passed a tree which we call the Crooked Tree. The trunk is straight for about four feet, then bends toward the north about two feet, and down two, out straight two, up two and one-half, out one, then up, branching out like a tree. One of its branches is something of the same shape. It is one of the many things in nature which one must see to realize how strange it is.

When we reached home we were rather tired, but after resting, Lula and I took another ramble, and after walking around awhile we climbed upon some large rocks behind the barn and sat down to rest. About four o'clock we heard Orion say something, about a catamount. We ran to the house to see what was the matter. He had seen one near the corral. He went to get the revolver, but while he was gone it had slipped away. That evening we saw it again; it passed over the rocks where Lula and I had been sitting in the afternoon. It was probably on the hunt of a colt, for there was a bunch of horses in the corral. The catamounts and mountain lions sometimes play sad havoc with the young colts. One day we went out to Lookout Peaks. From one we could see Wet-mountain Valley, Silver Cliff, Galena, and Yorkville, which are from three to fifteen miles distant. I once lived in Wet-mountain Valley. It is a lovely place in the summer time. From the other peak we could see Pueblo, Canyon, and Coal creek. We could see the iron works in Pueblo, which is about thirty miles distant, and could distinguish houses in Canyon, which is about twenty miles distant.

It was getting dusk and we were thinking of starting homeward, when some dark object ran through the brush below us. We had no weapon with us, and thought likely it was a bear, for they inhabit that portion of the mountain. My brother took a large club and said he would investigate. We were standing on a high cliff of rock. He went down, but came back presently, laughing, and said it was nothing but a black horse.

We went down then to where our horses were tied, mounted them, and rode home. On the way, when we were riding at quite a rapid pace, my horse suddenly jumped to one side, and I went off on the grass. Looking around to see what had frightened him, we saw a large black stump with the moonlight streaming across it. I was not hurt; my horse was soon caught, and we were off again as merry as ever.

It was a lovely moonlight evening, and we stopped for a moment to look around us. We could see far in the distance the snow-capped tops of the Sangre-de-Christo mountains. They are covered with snow the year around.

The next day we were busy all day gathering ferns and flowers to press and make wreaths of, and tree moss to make picture-frames.

The next day we went to Crystal Park, and gathered some of the most lovely crystals I ever saw. Some were the shape of diamonds, others were like bubbles. There is a cave in the side of a hill, and its walls are covered with crystals of various shapes and colors. On our way home we passed a dark, deep glen. The trees were waving in the cool evening breeze. The brow of the cliff was thickly covered with wild roses and evergreens.

After an absence of three weeks we again bade farewell to our friends, and began our descent of Crystal Mountain.

On our return trip we came by the way of Rock Spring, which is a natural curiosity, and reminds one of the biblical story of Aaron smiting the rock—a large rock set in the side of a bluff. The water comes out of a crevice in the rock and runs about two feet; then there is a cavity about as large as a teacup, where the water increases, then flows on about two feet farther, where there is a basin in the rock where many horses and cattle drink. After rambling about for half an hour, we came on home, where we were greeted by our friends and acquaintances.

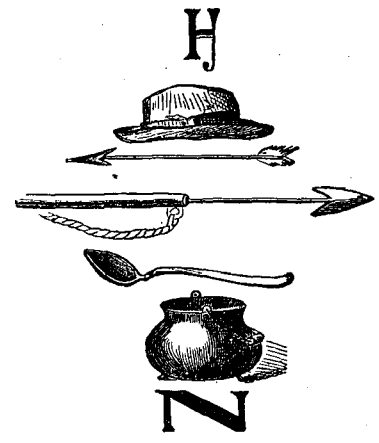
Our Puzzle Box.

1.—MATHEMATICAL.

A man has a circular farm. The fence around it is five rails high, and the rails are one-half rod long. If the farm contains as many acres as there are rails in the fence, how many acres does it contain?



Wm. Scott.

2.—CHARADE.

The farmer looked well both inside and out,
He knew that my first would be lurking about;
His pretty daughter my second drew on—
She was going out with the doctor's son;
The doctor himself to the garden came,
And asked for my whole by its Latin name:
A beautiful flower, whose purple leaf
Can conquer your pain, and soothe your grief.

Henry F. Smith.

3.—DIAMOND PUZZLE.

The central word is the same read either downward or across.

4.—ANAGRAM.

The pot can scarcely boil below,
Since "Hell" has lost its fervid glow.
'Tis not the magic of the name
That "Sheol" scarce suggests a flame.
That older day when I was young,
'Twas fiercely preached and prayed and sung;
And no one dreamed its vastness grand
Would fail to meet the great demand.
For still, the more they pumped, the more
Its thunders shook our earthly shore;
Till Talmage came with flip, flop, flap,
To pump at forty cents a clap—
And jumped and pumped, and pumped and jumped,
And jumped and stumped, and pumped and thumped;
Till, by incessant pumping dry,
"Hell" only faintly makes reply;
And now the pot scarce boils below,
Since "Hell" has lost its torrid glow.

J. K. P. Baker.

5.—CONUNDRUM.

This man is hot and getting hotter;
He sadly wants a drink of water;
To get it is no easy thing.
Where shall he go to find a spring?

Correspondence.

Washington, D. C., August 7, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I send herewith a couple of charades, which I hope may be of interest to the Children's Corner, a department of The Truth Seeker which I think indispensable, and which ought to be encouraged for the benefit of the rising generation. Although a child of larger growth, myself, I feel as much interest in anything appertaining to the welfare of the little ones as though I were again among them as one of their number. Hoping you may continue a successful management of your column, I remain,

Yours truly, for truth,
Henry F. Smith.

Clearwater, Neb., July 30, 286 E.M.

Dear Miss Wixon: In sending this poem for the Corner, let me congratulate you upon the improvement that is being made in its columns.

Your own beautiful stories and poems are as beacons to the lesser lights. The prizes offered, too, hav stimulated writers to better effort. I can only wish there were more generous friends who were able to giv to so worthy an object.

You are engraving the purple domes of science as a background to the picture, instead of the black clouds of superstition that hav long been painted upon the plastic minds of childhood. In a sad case of insanity that has lately come to my knowledge, the mind of the patient, in its pitiful wanderings, reverted to the past (though she had been entirely free for years, as we thought, from the dark shadow of Calvinism); but now her rambling sentences were interspersed with ravings of the "Christ-child"—as she designated one of her friends—"Bible prophecies," and "amens and amens." This picture, though it had been but a negativ to begin with, only needed insanity to reproduce it in all its Presbyterian horrors. These are the stereotyped views the clergy hav held up, for hundreds of years, for the benefit of men, women, and children (poor children). Now let the reverend doctors hav a taste of the medicin that Watson Heston knows so well how to administer.

Yours for humanity,
Mrs. Mary B. Finch.

[We trust the clouded mind of our poor sister may soon be restored to its natural vigor and brightness. Reason is the fairest jewel of the human being. To preserve it in its beauty and glory should be the aim of all, for one of the saddest sights in this world is a mind shrouded in mental gloom through false and cruel teaching. We thank our friend for kind appreciation of our work.—Ed. C. C.]

Hudson, July 26, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: Having nothing else to do, I will write a few lines to the Corner. I think the prize stories in the last two papers were excellent. I hav read and spoken a good many pieces out of the Children's Corner in school, but my teacher has never said anything about them. She is a Methodist, and very religious. To church I hav only been a few times, but Sunday-school I hav never attended, though not so few hav wanted me to go.

We are having a good, long vacation now, and I enjoy it very much, as I suppose everyone does. I hav read the story about "Two Little Red Mittens," and think it is very nice. It has been quite warm here lately, and the plants are dying for the want of rain, because it has not rained here for over two months. I seek for truth everywhere.

Your sincere friend, Christina Hanson.

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Death of G. Dell Keyser.

Mr. Keyser was a young Liberal of great promis, and, as I understand, was born and reared in the village of Avoca, Steuben Co., N. Y., and was about twenty-eight years old.

He was at the time of his death principal of a high school and bookkeeper for a railroad company. It would appear from the limited information which I was able to obtain that the overstrain from his various duties produced nervous prostration, from which he died.

Before he died he requested that Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, should deliver an address at his funeral. I wish the whole Christian world could hav been present to hear the grand speech of Brother Brown. I will not attempt to do him justice with my pen. Those who hav heard his concise, pithy, and logical addresses are the only ones who can form a just conception of it. It was philosophical, touching, full of pathos, and well calculated to reach the heart and leave a good impression. He was followed by some remarks of the writer. The funeral was attended at the Baptist church in the village, July 30th, at 3 o'clock P.M.

And here let another milestone be planted to mark the progress we are making. Twenty years ago it would hav tied a mill-stone around the neck of any orthodox society to volunteer the use of its church building for a Liberal funeral. But this the Baptist society did with a full knowledge of what was to follow. Let us giv credit where we can. For this generous act the church is to be commended.

At the grave Mr. William Dawson, of Kanona, N. Y., made some very fitting and timely remarks. Mr. Dawson is an old teacher, and has known Dell Keyser from a "dutiful boy" up to "honest and noble manhood." He said that Mr. Keyser had been trusted with vast sums of money, but had never betrayed a trust. This contrasts favorably with Christian bank defaulters and Sabbath-school superintendents who hav got away with so much of the people's money, and are now leading such pious lives over in Canada.

At the funeral the church was literally packed, and the lesson was forced home to hundreds of Christians that from the ranks of Freethinkers come as noble and unselfish men as the church ever produced.

I never attended a funeral that was conducted with more dignity and propriety. This should teach Liberals that they are no longer compelled to hav the mummery of the church and the cant of the minister at funerals when their friends pass away.

It is to be regretted that a young man of such promis could not hav been spared to ripen into mature and experienced manhood. He was a stanch young Liberal, and died without a stain upon his character.

Even dying in the morning of his manhood as he did, he has left a record that thousands might be proud of.

"No sound can awake him to glory again."

Religious Intolerance in Russia.

From the London Daily News.

The deplorable intolerance in religious matters which distinguishes Russian rule has just obtained fresh victims—one named Tikhanoff, an inferior functionary of the telegraphs; the other, Veksdine, a countryman. These were a few days ago summoned before the court of Novgorod for an offense against orthodoxy, an offense detailed in the 189th paragraph of the Penal law. Tikhanoff, it was alleged, had assembled various persons, and had told them that he could not find the orthodox church to be right in recommending the worship of holy images. "The savior," he said, "never spoke one word about such images. We ought to worship God alone, and when praying we should do well if we did as the savior told us to do, to go into our chamber instead of praying in the streets as the Pharisees did in old time, and as the orthodox do now." Many of the hearers sympathized with the views of Tikhanoff, and the other offender, Veksdine, seems to hav carried on an energetic agitation for "the new truth."

The two men charged with the offense were sentenced to hard labor. A great crowd attended the trial, consisting for the most part of sympathizers with the defendants. Only one of all the Russian papers and reviews has had the courage to make any remarks about this sentence. That organ, a review, called the Viestrik Tevropi (the European Messenger), asks what the adherents of Tikhanoff and Veksdine, who attended the trial, can think of the case? It can scarcely be supposed, the writer says, that this sentence will, in their eyes, be judged a sufficient proof that Tikhanoff and Veksdine are wrong, and the orthodox church right. It is much more probable that the condemned men will be considerd martyrs to truth, and that the number of their secret adherents will increase. All that the orthodox church can gain by its severity is to increase the number of religious hypocrits.

Book Notices.

"Agnostic First Principles," by Albert Simmons, with a preface by Richard Bithell, B.Sc., Ph.D., is a book that will delight those who, like the author, believe that Herbert Spencer is the greatest of men, past or present. For such is the position which Mr. Simmons accords the eminent synthetic philosopher. The two philosophers, he says, whose greatness approximates most nearly to that of Herbert Spencer are Auguste Comte and Francis Bacon. Yet these two combined, he believes, would scarcely equal one Spencer. The Platonic philosophy, we are told, is eclipsed by the Baconian, the Baconian by the Comtean, and the Comtean by the Spencerian. Yet "Plato is not more decidedly inferior to Bacon, Bacon is not more decidedly inferior to Comte, than Spencer is superior to all three." "Spencer is without doubt the first of philosophers. There is no second. He so far outdistances all competitors as to leave a great gap between himself and the one who comes nearest to him. That gap remains to be filled up. What Demosthenes is to orators, what Cæsar is to warriors, what Columbus is to discoverers, what Shakspere is to dramatists, what Milton is to poets, what Macaulay is to historians, Spencer is to philosophers. He is all that and much more."

Having got thus far, the reader will be prepared to receive the statement that Mr. Simmons comes "to praise Spencer, not to bury him." It is also a good place to stop and inquire whether our author has approached the subject with an altogether unbiased mind, and whether his enthusiastic admiration of Mr. Spencer has not rendered him oblivious to the merits of other philosophers. However, when the philosophy of Spencer comes under consideration, it is a relief to find that the adulatory style is abandoned, and the author devotes himself to a calm and mainly fair exposition of the principles of Agnosticism as he understands it. The remainder of the book deserves more praise than criticism.

Mr. Simmons falls in with Mr. Spencer's theory of the Unknowable, and devotes four chapters to that dogma. Those who are not familiar with the argument in support of the Unknowable may inquire how the Unknowable can longer remain such when its existence has been once ascertained, and we hav to that extent become acquainted with it, since the fact of its existence is the first and most fundamental knowledge concerning anything. This point, that the unknowable, once recognized, is no longer the unknowable, was raised by Stephen Pearl Andrews, and we do not know that it has ever been satisfactorily settled.

In his chapter on "Objections and Replies" Mr. Simmons deals with the Theist, the Atheist, the Pantheist, and the Positivist. The first he handles very tenderly. The Atheist is met with the assertion that the Unknowable is the sole real existence; the Knowable in all its forms is simply a manifestation of the Unknowable, and matter is not therefore the ultimate cause, as the Materialistic Atheist holds. The Pantheist, who believes that nature embraces everything, receives this reply:

"What, however, do we know of that which is inside nature? Nothing but the phenomenal. In its ultimate essence everything in nature is utterly incomprehensible. Hence nature herself inevitably brings us round to the Unknowable, and the Unknowable to Agnosticism."

The Deist is rightly told that the ascription of form or even attributes to the deity is not only not elevating, but is positivly derogatory and degrading.

Finally, our author's hottest vials of wrath are reserved to be poured out upon the disciples of Auguste Comte in general and Mr. Frederic Harrison in particular. "Mr. Harrison," he says, "seldom speaks save to sing the praises of Positivism; and he never praises Positivism without blaming Agnosticism." This may be true, but with the terms reversed it would be equally true of Mr. Simmons so far as the present volume is concerned. We find it further stated in a note that "scarcely three months hav elapsed since Mr. Harrison retired under a crushing defeat from his magazine controversy with Mr. Spencer." Now, anyone who read the discussion referred to knows that, so far as it represents Mr. Harrison as suffering a "crushing defeat," the above statement is not true. Mr. Spencer was far from having what sporting persons would call a "walk-over." If ever he met a foeman worthy of his steel, he found one in Frederic Harrison. It may be that Mr. Harrison was mainly wrong; it may be that Mr. Spencer was mainly right, or it may be that both were mistaken; but it can not be honestly said that either was in any sense crushed.

The reader is diverted occasionally by the author's stopping to reassert his unalterable faith in the permanency of the synthetic philosophy. It is not "overturnable even by a foe so formidable as might be made by adding all the brilliancy and ability which Mr. Harrison possesses to all the profundity which he ought to possess, and multiplying the product by the sum-total of the saints in the Positivist pantheon." Exactly what the result of such a mathematical process as the author suggests would be it is hard to say, and applying that result to the overturning of a philosophy could only increase the difficulties of the problem. "That philosophy [the synthetic]," he goes on to say, "we hold to be as lasting as the everlasting hills, and as ceaseless as the never-ceasing sea." Holding which faith it must be apparent that discussion is a waste of time, since, an unalterable conclusion having been arrived at, any amount of argument could not hope to change it.

Near the middle of the volume a definition of Agnosticism is reached. Hitherto we hav been content with such a definition as Professor Huxley, who originally employed the word Agnostic, was enabled to frame. It ran like this:

"Agnosticism simply means that a man shall not say he knows or believes that which he has no scientific grounds for professing to know or believe."

Freethinkers who did not like the word Atheist, upon seeing this, were quite ready to accept it as a description of the position which they occupied as regards the origin and destiny of man and the existence of God. Mr. Simmons looks upon Professor Huxley's success at definition as so indifferent as to be scarcely distinguishable from positiv failure, and, having rejected it, formulates the following for a true definition, viz.,

"Agnosticism is completely-unified knowledge of the manifestations of the Unknowable."

This at least puts the matter in a new form if not in a new light, and if the definition is authoritativ a good many persons who hav enlisted under the Agnostic banner will be ready to resign. So far from being the modest person described by Professor Huxley, the Agnostic now comes forward to lay claim to an amount of wisdom which nobody will ever be able to acquire. The original significance of the word Agnostic is thus lost sight of altogether, and even the Unknowable is subjected to a familiarity which almost breeds contempt. Besides the knowledge of its existence, we are now expected to hav a comprehensiv knowledge of its manifestations, which sort of knowledge is all that we can possess about anything. We know nothing more of nature than its manifestations, yet we cannot call nature the Unknowable.

Agnosticism and the Unknowable are Mr. Simmons's two chief terms. We hav seen that he defines the first in such a way that it is no longer Agnosticism according to the meaning of the word; and the Unknowable which he deals with is not unknowable at all. The term is a misnomer. We are interested to know whether the author is a representativ of a class of Agnostics, or whether he is sui generis.

But let not the reader from what has been written here imagin that "Agnostic First Principles" contains nothing of value. On the contrary, it is full of grand truths. True, it is an apotheosis of Spencer, but Spencer has earned it. Criticism is here directed at the book as an exposition of Agnosticism as we understand that philosophy.

"Agnostic First Principles" is published by Watts & Co., London. The price in this country is $1. Octavo, 96 pages.

"Practical Experience with Poultry," an advertisment of which appears elsewhere, is a book full of suggestions for anyone owning an acre of land where domestic fowls could be kept. Mr. Davenport, the author, has tried raising hens, and this book can be depended upon as an honest account of his experience in that line. He treats of the hen as a semi-rational creature—one who will be pleased with the interest taken in her calling, and who will coöperate with her keeper to bring about the best results. The ordinary farmer, he points out, treats his hens with the greatest indifference, not to say coldness, looking upon them as sort of necessary nuisances, that dig up his garden in the spring, keep the barn floor in disorder, and eat the heads off his grain before it is harvested, and burrow and scratch in it afterward. So little interest does the average agriculturist take in his fowls that he often does not even know how many of them he owns. He gathers an occasional egg if he is so fortunate as to find one, and has a chicken for dinner on Thanksgiving day if, with the assistance of a rake and the other members of the household, he can contrive to catch it. To sum up in a word, the farmer and his fowls, as our author puts it, are "antagonistic." This is all wrong. The ability of the hen to hustle for herself shows that she possesses inherent enterprise, which if cultivated and encouraged in the right direction will inure to the profit of the owner. All the details necessary to this end are given in the book, which, we may say here, sells for 25 cents, and can be purchased at THE TRUTH SEEKER book store. It is to be regretted that the author did not employ some competent person to straighten out the verbal tangles in which he occasionally becomes involved, as such a process would often serve to bring his meaning into greater prominence. A conscientious printer, even, might here hav helped him wonderfully. But perhaps it may be taken for granted that poultry raisers are not given to literary criticism, so this point need not be insisted upon as material. Besides being an intelligent and practical farmer, Mr. Davenport is a Freethinker who has known what it is to suffer financial and corporeal injury in defense of the truth; and in addition to acting as correspondent and contributor for numerous agricultural journals, he is a Freethought missionary, distributing Liberal literature as far and wide as his means will permit. His book deserves a wide circulation, for, as near as can be judged, it contains all that is necessary to be known about the care and keeping of fowls.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has published in book form articles that originally appeared in the Nineteenth Century, from the pens of Wm. E. Gladstone, Prof. T. H. Huxley, Prof. Max Muller, A. Réville, D.D., and Mrs. E. Lynn Linton.

The rare display of gentlemanly courtesy is a charming feature of the book, but its chief attraction is the masterly marshaling of arguments by scholastic giants, each in the support of his own theory concerning the Mosaic account of creation. In supporting the Mosaic account, Mr. Gladstone evidently places much dependence on his knowledge of Greek history of the times of Homer. M. Réville concedes what he feels compelled as a scholar to admit, and he is backed up by Prof. Max Muller, who argues from a thorough knowledge of comparativ philology, while Prof. T. H. Huxley supports him with arguments grounded in complete understanding of geological formations of the different ages from paleozoic up to the present time.

The last chapter of the book is a beautifully-written protest against the positions of Mr. Gladstone, and a plea for the race against the egotistic tendencies of the religion championed by Mr. Gladstone. The book will be read with interest by debaters especially, and by all who enjoy courteous controversy.—Nonconformist.

OF
BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

"SHOPPEL'S MODERN HOUSES" No. 3.
(Just Published, July 1, 1886) CONTAINS:

A colored frontispiece showing the modern style of painting.

A cardboard supplement, ingeniously drawn and colored, to supply all the neccessary pieces for constructing a model house, with plain directions for putting them together.

While the supplement affords both old and young the greatest amusement, it is more than a toy. It is, in fact, a most practical lesson in Architecture; a perfect, scaled model of one of our most popular designs, so exact that it is useful to builders.

55 New Designs for Residences (cost varying from $500 to $15,000).
2 New Designs for Barns.
1 New Design for a Chapel.
Drawings and description of a model Kitchen (by Maria Parloa) and a perfect Cistern.

THE Belgian workingmen are demanding universal suffrage. Socialist agitations continue.

THERE seems division of opinion in the Catholic church in regard to its attitude toward the Knights of Labor.

IT is predicted that Home Rule will soon be obtained for Ireland, but that the land question has great trouble in store. The landlords are bitter and obstinate.

SECRETARY BAYARD has dispatched Mr. Sedgwick to arraign the Mexican government for its outrages. Meanwhile both Mexico and Texas are making preparations for war.

MANY reports from Rhode Island state, with what truth cannot be determined, that liquor is sold there in larger quantities and more drunken men are seen than before Prohibition was attempted.

EXPOSURES of corruption in N. Y. city government are proceeding with great vigor —but with more notoriety and profit for the newspapers leading the movement than salutary punishments meted the swindlers.

THE Andover School of Theology has been accused by the Congregationalists of undermining their faith, and a bitter theological warfare is in progress. The wrangle is principally over the doctrin of eternal punishment.

MR. POWDERLY says of the approaching Knights of Labor convention: "I hav no hesitation in saying that this will be the largest convention representing the interests of labor that has ever been called together in any part of the civilized world in ancient or modern times."

RIOTING in the Belfast districts still continues. Dispatches say: "Protestants declare that Catholics were the aggressors by wrecking Protestant houses, while Catholics are equally certain that Protestants were the aggressors. Of one thing there is no doubt: Never did two mobs of different religions display a more bloodthirsty desire to kill or maim each other."

THE Home Club, a secret society of self-seeking and dishonest labor reformers, has attained possession of D. A. 49 of the Knights of Labor, in this city, and has commenced a warfare against trade unions with the purpose of rendering its own power absolute. The cigarmakers' unions, with which it has come in conflict, hav obtained a victory over it; and now several unions refuse to join the approaching great labor parade in this city on the ground that a Home Club leader is to be grand marshal.

ANNUAL CONVENTION

OF THE

NEW YORK STATE

FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION,

TO BE HELD AT

White Sulphur Springs Park, Saratoga Co., New York.

From Thursday, Sept. 2d, to Sunday, Sept. 12th, 1886.

Reduction on all railroad routes. Special excursion rates to Saratoga from all points.

The best Liberal speakers will be in attendance. The following is the list so far as they hav accepted: John Peck—subject, "The Gods on Exhibition;" Lucy N. Colman—subjects, "Reminiscences in the Life of a Reformer," and "Woman's Duty To-day in the World's Work;" W. S. Bell—subject, "Conflict Between Christianity and Civilization;" Mrs. F. C. Reynolds—subject, "Woman: Past, Present, and Future;" J. L. Andrew—subject, "Modern Infidelity;" Miss Susan H. Wixon.

Splendid facilities are afforded for boating, bathing, fishing, driving; magnificent scenery. The best dancing pavilion in the state. Fine band. Everything necessary to an enjoyable occasion. All the advantages of a visit to Saratoga will be afforded visitors, thus combining the attractions of that popular watering-place with those of the convention.

Season tickets, admitting the bearer to all lectures, $1.00. First-class board, $1.00 per day. (It will greatly facilitate matters if orders for season tickets with remittance accompany applications for rooms.) Applications for tickets and rooms should be addressed to C. B. Reynolds, 33 Clinton Place, New York. Contributions, necessary to defray preliminary expenses, may be sent to the treasurer, E. M. Macdonald.

EX-PRESIDENT HAYES attended the charities convention in St. Paul a few days ago. Since he gave a distant relativ of his $4 a short time back, he has appointed himself a philanthropist of the first water. He'd better stay at home and spend his spare time leading the hens to water.

GREAT regret has been expressed at the non-attendance at the Concord School of Philosophy of our own Sullivan. But then, we can't expect all our literary men are going to leave New York together. If that were to happen, we wouldn't know but what we were living away back there in Boston.

A CHURCH in a country village recently circulated a paper among the congregation asking for contributions "for the purpose of paying the organist and a boy to blow the same."

A MAN and his wife agreed recently to learn a verse of scripture every evening, and repeat it to each other for mutual improvement. The first night, however, her quotation happened to be, "Am I not thy ruler?" and his was to the effect that he'd be hanged if she was, and the only result of the plan, so far, has been that he has taken to drink, and exhibits a willingness to sleep in the wood-shed at night.

CHRISTIAN fetichism, though it dies hard, will be as glaringly absurd in time as heathen fetichism is now.—Waters's Through Rome On.

"I SHOULD not believe such a story, were it told me by Cato," was a proverbial saying in Rome, even during the lifetime of that philosophical patriot. The incredibility of a fact, it was allowed, might invalidate so great an authority. —Hume's Essay on Miracles.

LET the god within thee be the guardian of a living being, masculin, adult, political, and a Roman, and a ruler; who has taken up his post in life as one that awaits with readiness the signal that shall summon him away. . . . And such a man, who delays no longer to strive to be in the number of the best, is as a priest and servant of the gods, obeying that god who is in himself enshrined, who renders him unsoiled of pleasure, unharmed of any pain, untouched by insult, feeling no wrong, a wrestler in the noblest struggle, which is that by no passion he may be overthrown; dyed to the depth in justice, and with his whole heart welcoming whatsoever cometh to him and is ordained.—M. A. Antoninus.

IT is the greatest of delusions to suppose that we come into this world as sheets of white paper on which the age can write anything it likes, making us good or bad, noble or mean, as the age pleases. The age can stunt, promote, or pervert pre-existing capacities, but it cannot create them. The worthy Robert Owen, who saw in external circumstances the great molders of human character, was obliged to supplement his doctrin by making the man himself one of the circumstances. It is as fatal as it is cowardly to blink facts because they are not to our taste. How many disorders, ghostly and bodily, are transmitted to us by inheritance? In our courts of law, whenever it is a question whether a crime has been committed under the influence of insanity, the best guidance the judge and jury can hav is derived from the parental antecedents of the accused. If among these insanity be exhibited, in any marked degree, the presumption in the prisoner's favor is enormously enhanced, because the experience of life has taught both judge and jury that insanity is frequently transmitted from parent to child.—Tyndall On Man's Soul.

THE Catholic notion admits miracles in the mass; the Protestant notion invites to a criticism by which it must finally itself perish. When Stephen was martyred, he looked up into heaven and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God. That, says the Protestant, is solid fact. At the martydom of St. Fractuosus, Babylas and Mygdona, the Christian servants of the Roman governor, saw the heavens open and the saint and his deacon, Eulogius, carried up on high with crowns on their heads. That, says the Protestant, is imposture, or else illusion. St. Paul hears on his way to Damascus the voice of Jesus say to him, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" That, again, is solid fact. The companion of St. Thomas Aquinas hears a voice from the crucifix say to the praying saint, "Thou hast written well of me, Thomas; what recompense dost thou desire?" That again is imposture or else illusion. Why? It is impossible to find any criterion by which one of these incidents may establish its claim to a solidity which we refuse to the others.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

MAN is born to trouble and toil as the sparks fly upward. Let him toil, therefore, as his best is, and make no noise about the matter.—Carlyle's Letters.

IF a man asks me what the politics of the inhabitants of the moon are, and I reply that I do not know; that neither I, nor anyone else, has any means of knowing, and that under these circumstances I decline to trouble myself about the subject at all, I do not think he has any right to call me a "skeptic." On the contrary, in replying thus I conceive that I am simply honest and truthful, and show a proper regard to the economy of time. So Hume's strong and subtle intellect takes up a great many problems about which we are naturally curious, and shows us that they are essentially questions of lunar politics, in their essence incapable of being answered, and therefore not worth the attention of men who hav work to do in the world. . . . We liv in a world which is full of misery and ignorance, and the plain duty of each and all of us is to try to make the little corner he can influence somewhat less miserable and somewhat less ignorant than it was before he entered it.—Huxley's Physical Basis of Life.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 13. No. 35. PUBLISHED WEEKLY. New York, Saturday, August 28. 1886. 33 CLINTON PLACE. $3.00 per year.

THREE KINDS OF BAPTISM.

Notes and Clippings.

THE keeper of a convict camp near Lumpkin, Ga., says that among the eighty-six negro convicts thirty-five are preachers, and all are members of the church.

DR. REGINALD STUART POOLE, of the British Museum, has procured for Boston a valuable Colossus of Rameses II. It sits thirteen feet high, and will be brought down the Nile when the river rises in February.

ON the 21st ult. Colonel Gilder's party departed on their land trip to the North Pole. They carried with them the "God bless you's" of their friends, and various other somewhat more efficient provisions for safety.

SAM JONES says the Germans are trying to ruin our Sabbath; that they "are trying to take this country, but this is America. The question for you people to settle is, Shall we turn this country over to the devil, the Dutch, and the drunkards?"

A BUFFALO newspaper is responsible for the statement that, after a meeting the other evening, Bishop Coxe said to a reporter: "I should like to correct the proof-sheet of my prayer. You newspaper men and the printers are so unfamiliar with prayer that you're pretty certain to bungle it up badly."

IN his visit to England, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes manifests great affection for that nation, exemplifying the usual utter indifference of literary men to the condition of the masses or their abuse by a tyrannical government. In his farewell address he says, "So I will say with one of the first Puritan exiles, 'Farewell, dear, dear England!'"

THE committee in charge of the matter hav concluded not to ask Sam Jones to return to Chicago this fall, as was the original intention. The reason is that, after publicly renouncing tobacco, he has gone back to the use of the weed. They say that a man who asks others to make a great resolve ought to be able to keep his own good resolutions.

FARMER (to country minister): "I 'kin bring you in a couple of bushels of apples, dominie, if you'd like 'em. I've got a lot of 'em goin' to rot." Minister: "Thanks, Mr. Hayseed; I would be very glad to get them. Hav you ever tried feeding them to hogs? I hear they are very fattening." Farmer: "Yes, I've offered 'em to the hogs, but they won't touch 'em."

THE Beecher family is a thrifty one. Mr. Beecher is under salary to his congregation. Meanwhile he is lecturing abroad under the Pond management. Meanwhile, also, he is preaching on Sunday, and his sermons are being published in the Brooklyn Magazine, and he receives a royalty for the publication. Meanwhile, still further, Mrs. Beecher is writing letters about the trip for the same magazine and she comes in for her share of pin money.

SOME time ago, a teacher in charge of a school in a west Georgia county was approached by a pupil and requested to explain the meaning of "49 B.C." The teacher read the sentence in which the hieroglyphics occurred, and observed that it referred to an incident that had taken place in a remote period. "Ahem!" he said, "them figgers an' them letters is frequently found in history books. You see, a long time ago, folks didn't know 's much 's we do, an' they sorter guessed at dates. Now, 49 B.C. means 49 'bout correct."

THE Congregationalists are divided over a choice of the proper doctrin with which to charge departing missionaries. Some wish to instruct them to execute their work with reference to the belief that all to whom the gospel has not been preached will perish eternally; others prefer the doctrin that an opportunity will be afforded heathens to accept the gospel after they die; and others insist upon informing the missionaries that the very latest thing to believe is that many will be saved without having heard the gospel at all.

A DEACON of a Greenville, Pa., church has a string of buttons half a yard long, taken out of the contribution-box within a few years. What business has the deacon with the buttons? They were contributed for the heathen, and several scores of heathen hav been obliged to hitch their suspenders with a shingle nail because of this embezzling deacon. Now the deacon is confessing, let him tell what he did with the money—if there was any. What good are these deacons, anyway, if a button must be stopped short of its mission?

THE Chester county, Pa., Prohibition political convention adopted as the main plank in its platform the following: "1. We reverently acknowledge almighty God as the source of all authority in civil government, and Christ as the king of nations. We believe that all human enactment should conform to his will. We express our gratitude to him for the progress made thus far in the Prohibition cause and hereby trust in him for the help we need to gain the final victory." If God does so much for the Prohibitionists why in the world doesn't he boost their candidates into office?

MISS LILLIE DEVEREUX BLAKE is trying to reason the timidity out of the woman-women. She said in her recent Buffalo address: "A woman, in order to vote, does not need to be about seventeen feet high, dress in armor, and get up on horseback. Why, the ballot-paper is not as big or as heavy as the fan I hold in my hand, and women who hav voted hav survived the operation, hav gone home and been able not only to recognize their friends, but to go about their ordinary duties, without experiencing any evil effects whatever." But this is more than can be said for many male sovereigns after visiting the polls.

WOMEN, it is well known, are excluded from the colleges and universities of the German empire. Both men and women look with derision and disdain upon the girl aspirant for academical honors. They do not consider women capable of advanced training, and are the bitterest opponents of coeducation. A rather pathetic story is told of a woman in Leipsic who tried to overcome the laws. She was a poor girl, and, disguised as a young man, entered the university with honors, and took her place in the laboratory as a student of chemistry. She applied herself assiduously during three years, and distinguished herself beyond her fellows. Her popularity was great, though she was innocently called the "lady," because of her feminin appearance—the students little dreaming how near th truth they came. But her sex was discovered on the day of her final examination, and, despite prayers and entreaties, she was not allowed to graduate.

Evolution and Special Creation.

II.—THE BEGINNING OF LIFE UPON THE EARTH.

Nor hav the experiments performed with a view to settle questions been so conclusiv against the claims of evolution as would appear to some. At all events, the question is an open one whether the origin of living things in non-living matter has not been experimentally demonstrated. The old doctrin of "spontaneous generation" has in its new form, and under its recent name of Abiogenesis or Archebiosis, some men of great eminence in the scientific world at the present time on its side. Pouchet, a very illustrious Frenchman, performed a very large number of experiments, and in most of them he succeeded, according to his own opinion, in producing living things. The objection that there were germs in the air, or water, or in the materials he employed, he met by manufacturing artificial water out of oxygen and hydrogen, and submitting the whole of the material employed to a temperature above boiling-water point, which would certainly destroy any living germ, either of an animal or vegetable character. Then in England a series of experiments hav been performed by Dr. Bastian, one of the leading scientists of our time; and the results hav been given to the world in some voluminous and masterly books. Dr. Bastian maintains that he has succeeded, in innumerable instances, in producing living organisms from non-living matter. Hence the doctrin of evolution, which is in accordance with true philosophy, finds its support in that physical science where we should expect to meet with it, and to which it really belongs.

ORIGIN OF MAN.

The theory of evolution on this point is that man did not always exist, and that he is not the product of a special creativ act, but rather the result of innumerable changes from the lower to the higher, each step in advance being an evolution from preëxisting conditions. No well-informed person will dispute the fact that the remains of man are met with only in the most recent deposits of a geological character. No doubt human beings hav been in existence for a much longer period than is generally supposed; the short term of six thousand years, which our fathers considered to cover man's entire history, pales into insignificance before the vast periods which we know to hav rolled their course since human life began.

But that fact in no ways affects the question before us. Man was certainly the last animal that appeared, as he was the highest. If it be asked, Why highest as well as last? the answer is that because, by the process of evolution, the highest must come last. This is the law that has been seen operating all through the physical universe, so far as that universe has disclosed its mighty secrets, hidden for ages, but now revealed to scientific observation and experiment. Man came, as all other organic bodies came, by no special creation, but by the great forces of nature, moving always in the same direction and working to the same end. As far as the physical powers are concerned, it will not be difficult to conceive the same laws in operation as to his origin which originated the various other forms of organic beings. His body is built up of the same materials, upon precisely the same plan; during life he is subject to the same growth and decay, building up and pulling down of tissues, and it is but reasonable to suppose that the same forces originated his beginning, as we know they will some day terminate his existence.

Mr. Darwin made a bold stroke when he gave to the world his "Descent of Man." In 1859 he published the first edition of his work on "The Origin of Species," which fell like a thunderbolt into the religious camp. The commotion it caused was tremendous, and the effect to-day can hardly be imagined, so tolerant hav we grown of late, and such a change has passed over the scene within the last quarter of a century. The most violent opposition raged against the new views; ridicule, denunciation, and abuse were hurled at the head of the man who pronounced so preposterous a theory as that all organic things had sprung from a few simple forms very low down in the scale of being.

Then came the larger work, entitled, "Animals and Plants under Domestication," brimful of facts of a most startling character, supporting the theory advanced in the previous book, and challenging refutation on all hands. In the face of these facts, the public cooled down a little; opposition became milder; some opponents were converted, and others manifested indifference. The major part of those who still adhered to the supernatural and special creations held that, even if the theory of evolution turned out to be true, it would not apply to man, who was a being possessed of an immortal soul, and therefore belonging to a different order of creatures from any other animals, and that Mr. Darwin never intended to include human beings in the organic structures thus originated.

In this state the controversy remained until 1871, when Mr. Darwin took the bull by the horns, and at one stroke swept away the last stronghold of special creation by showing that humanity was no exception to the great law of evolution; for man, like other animals, had originated in natural selection. The facts given in the book on "The Descent of Man" are both powerful and pertinent. This, however, is not the place to dwell upon natural selection, and it is only referred to so far as it supports evolution. The difficulties that hav been placed in the way of the application of this principle to man hav not had much reference to his bodily organs, but mainly to his mental and moral powers, his social faculties, and the emotional side of his nature. True, a controversy raged for a short time between Huxley and Owen as to whether there was not a special structure in the human brain not to be found in the next animals lower in the scale of being; but this contention has long since died out, and to-day no anatomist of any note will be found contending for the existing of any such organ. That the human brain differs considerably from the brain of any lower animal no one, who is at all acquainted with the subject, will deny; but this is difference in degree, and not arising from the presence of any special structure in the one which is absent in the other. Man, therefore, must look for his origin just where he seeks for that of the inferior creatures.

The science of embryology, which is now much more carefully studied, and, consequently, much better known, than at any period in the past, lends very powerful support to evolution, though, perhaps, little to natural selection. "The primordial germs," says Huxley, "of a man, a dog, a bird, a fish, a beetle, a snail, and a polyp are in no essential structural respects distinguishable" (Lay Sermons). Each organism, in fact, commences its individual career at the same point—that is, in a single cell. These cells are of the same chemical composition, approximately of the same size, and appear to be in all respects identical. Yet the one develops into a fish, another into a reptil, a third into a bird, a fourth into a dog, and a fifth into a man. The process is the same in all up to a certain point. First the cell divides into two, then into four, eight, sixteen, and so on, until a particular condition is reached, called by Haeckel morula, when a totally different set of changes occur. In the case of the higher animals the development of the embryo so clearly resembles that of man up to a very late period that the appearances presented are exceedingly similar.

The believers in special creation hav a great difficulty to confront here. Evolution upon this point clearly carries off the palm. If it be not actually demonstrated to be true, yet the arguments in its favor are so powerful, and the facts upon which they are based so strong and numerous, that opposition must hide its head abashed.

II.

DIVERSITY OF LIVING THINGS.

The naturalistic theory usually adopted at the present day to explain the diversity of structure and form met with in living beings is that set forth by Mr. Darwin and called "natural selection." But this is not the only theory known to men of science. Others preceded it, and more, no doubt, will follow. Evolution is independent of all these, and yet it may obtain support from any of them. Having reached living organisms, of either animal or vegetable character, the problem that presents itself for solution is the method by which they may develop into the multiplicity of forms that we now meet with on the earth. Haeckel, one of the most enthusiastic of the scientific evolutionists living, tells us that we can, by means of evolution, giv a mechanical explanation of the most complicated organic phenomena. "In fact," he says, "such events as the origin and formations of the organs of the senses present to the eye of the understanding, guided by the light of evolution, no more difficulties than the explanation of any ordinary process, such as earthquakes, winds, or tides." Life, according to this author, is simply mechanical force, and the supposed difference between the living body and non-living matter he wipes out. Evolution sets forth the doctrin that all forms of animal and vegetable life hav been successivly developed from the lowest organisms. From these low organic bodies we now start, and proceed to account for higher and more complex structures.

As early as the latter end of the last century the great German philosopher and poet, Goethe, taught that all the higher forms of living beings had developed from the lower, and some ten years later he considerably expanded the idea from investigation in embryology, a branch of science, as already stated, which throws a flood of light upon the subject. Subsequently he was followed in the same field by Oken, the discoverer of what is termed transcendental anatomy, a doctrin most closely allied to evolution, and lending it very important support. Some of Oken's theories were very whimsical, but on the whole he was a man of profound scientific knowledge and marvelous insight. Mr. Darwin's theory came afterward, and it is certainly superior to any of those that preceded it, because it had its basis in the known facts of natural history. This truth will be conceded even by those who dispute the conclusions arrived at, and who hold to the dictum of special creation. In fact, we may say, with Mr. Huxley, that "there is but one hypothesis as to the origin of species of animals in general, which has any scientific existence—that propounded by Mr. Darwin." Although that hypothesis is now fairly known, a brief description of it may prove interesting.

The rate of increase among animals and plants is so great as to render it an absolute certainty that millions must perish every year. Even elephants, and others of the very slowest-breeding of all animals, would soon overstock the countries where they dwell, and even the world itself, were not large numbers destroyed. As to the plants, Huxley has shown that if we started with only one to-day, and all the seeds which it givs off should grow, the same thing happening to each new plant thus produced, in turn, in nine years all the dry land on the surface of the earth would be covered. Of course this does not occur, and the reason is obvious: Myriads of plants are every year destroyed, so that each species is kept in proper bounds. This givs rise to what is known by the term, "the struggle for existence;" and the result is that the strongest, or those in some way best adapted to the environment, remain, while the rest disappear. Herbert Spencer calls this "the survival of the fittest." Now, that this really occurs, few, if any, persons will deny. The only ground upon which any dispute may arise will be, how far changes can occur in any organisms by this law.

Mr. Darwin has shown that in all organic bodies there is a tendency to vary. No single offspring of an animal will be exactly like its parents, and the variation, however small it may be, may go on increasing generation after generation until the newly acquired characteristics may completely overbalance the old ones. This principle is well enough understood by the breeders of cattle, and by horticulturists, who take advantage of it to produce, if not a new species, yet a variety differing very much from that from which it sprung. The four great breeds of pigeons all came from one stock, differing considerably from either of the original parents—as much, in fact, as they differ from each other. This change has been brought about by what Darwin calls methodical selection—that is, the destroying any young which might show indications of a partial return to the original stock. Acting on this principle, the cattle-breeder, the dog-fancier, the gardener, and others produce new and choice varieties of the particular organism with which they hav to deal. The most beautiful flowers and the most delicate fruits in our gardens hav been thus evolved out of wild plants lacking all the charming qualities of their descendants. So in the case of the domestic animals, how wide is the difference between the pig, the goose, the duck, etc., and the original stock from which they sprung! True, in all these cases the agency of man has been employed to bring about the change, and his intellect has guided the natural power which is thus turned to such useful account. But as man does not of himself make the change, but only selects under natural law, the same thing could go on without him did the demand for it arise. Say, for example, that a change takes place which favors the animal in obtaining its food, then it is clear that such an altered condition, however slight, would giv it an advantage in the struggle for life, and tend to perpetuate its existence, while those individuals which remained in their original state would, being subject to less favorable conditions, die and disappear.

Now, according to the theory of natural selection, this variability enabling the individual organisms in which it occurs to liv, while others of the same species die, may go on increasing through untold generations, until an organism is produced the species of which will be entirely different from the one in which it had its origin at first. The slow accumulation of different parts in the changes which take place thus givs rise in the end to new species, and even to distinct genera and orders. The same law which we see daily producing new varieties will in longer periods originate different species, and in still more extended time giv rise to new genera, orders, and even classes. Thus, beginning with the lowest organisms, we arrive in time at all those marvelous forms of living things with which we are acquainted.

This, in a few words, is Mr. Darwin's theory of natural selection, and how it favors evolution will be apparent to the most superficial thinker. It must be borne in mind, as before mentioned, that, even if Darwin's theory is not the correct one, evolution is not thereby proved to be wrong. CHARLES WATTS.

More New Jersey Christianity.

From the Beverly Banner.

Last week an Infidel was mobbed at the town of Boonton, Morris county, his tent destroyed, and he narrowly escaped with his life. The speaker began his remarks by denouncing the Bible, and holding up the Christian religion to ridicule. The ministers of the gospel were sneered at as "lazy cranks," and church people generally denounced. While this is a free country, and everyone is his own master, and allowed to believe and follow such religion as his conscience dictates, still, when a man—if he can be called such—takes a platform and denounces that which is held most sacred by all classes of people, it is time Judge Lynch were allowed to take an upper hand in the conquest. For, where is the class of people who havn't their God? From the lower classes of Central Africa to the highly civilized and cultured inhabitants of Europe and America, each hav their own idea as to religion and to a God, and when a man who has fallen so low as to take a public stand and announce it as his belief that there is no God, and no hereafter, and try to persuade, and in some instances succeed, in inducing men and women to follow him in his infamous career, a tar-and-feather overcoat would be too good for him.

Antiquities of India.

"The Bible in India," by Jacolliot, has been denounced by Profs. Max Müller and Fiske. But Jacolliot's chief opponent in Paris, Taxtor de Ravisi, a Catholic, admits that the book is written "with good faith, of absorbing interest, a learned work on known facts, and with familiar arguments." Ten years' residence and study in India surely ought to hav fitted Jacolliot to know more about Indian antiquities than college professors in England or America. He is still writing in Paris, and his volumes number over twenty. In the second volume, "Les fils de Dieu (The Sons of God)," he demolishes the critics who attempted to decry his first work, and proves by astronomical monumental records the great antiquity of Indian history. Brahmanism was established as early as 13,300 B C. About 10,000 B.C., there was a revolt of the chiefs against Brahmanical authority, the capital of the Brahmans was taken, and Viswamitra became the first king of India. Chrishna was born 4,800 B.C., and died 4,760 B.C.

Buddhism arose several centuries later. It obtained little foothold in India, but spread widely elsewhere. The Mohammedans overran Northern India, and destroyed the temples and books of the Brahmans. But Southern India remained undisturbed. The northern Brahmans had to reproduce their books from copies in the South, and in doing so made variations. It is these variations that hav misled the critics. Jacolliot had access to the oldest records in Southern India.

The above facts are gathered from a personal perusal of Jacolliot's second work, "Les fils de Dieu," in 1877. The top-lofty Sanscrit scholars who denounce him as a charlatan are blind leaders of the blind. ANTICHRIST.

Spirits, Wise and Otherwise, at Onset Bay.

I am still pursuing my investigations of the "mysterious spirit forces" here at Onset Bay, forces which would not be so very mysterious, perhaps, if we had a little more knowledge, and were not quite so ignorant of the machinery of the dear old world in which we liv and move and hav our being. I hav been told to-day that I am pursued by the diakka, whatever that may be, but I hav such a keen sense of the ridiculous that I shall laugh him off his track, I expect. Really, between all that I hear of spirit personation, transfiguration, materialization, transmogrification, and a deal of botheration, I am in a state of bewilderation sometimes that only those in similar circumstances can appreciate. The pretenders and deceivers approximate so closely to the genuin in the phenomena that it really requires an expert to detect the difference between them. Now, after Mr. Truesdell has told the tricks of Spiritualism and how to do them, intelligent people on the rostrum here declare that he is a genuin, no mistake medium of the first water, and Bob Trowbridge, his "control," one of the smartest spirits in the summer land! No wonder that people run wild and crazy on materialization, and demand flesh and blood, bone and muscle, gowns, ribbons, lace, whiskers, from the spirit land, and really think they get it! But they cannot make the features recognizable—how is that? I must tell you that I hav the testimony of four sitters at a seance that they went home with faces marked with chalk where they had kissed the spirits! I shall pray that my kisses may come to me pure and unadulterated with chalk or plaster of Paris. By the way, I am almost of the opinion that the craze for spirit materialization is because of the warm, sweet kisses with which the "spirit" greets the mortal! I think the price is considerable, however—from one to five dollars—and I'll be perfectly content to take mine from the sweet, sweet friends on this side of the river of Jordan. About the shrewdest, smartest persons on the ground are the "materializing mediums," and it is they who are coining the money—and a hundred dollars per day is not so bad, is it? I try to find in their seances something true and real, i.e., something as they represent, but I grieve to say I find it not.

There is preaching and preaching here on the Spiritual grounds, and some of it is good, practical, true, and I giv credit to Spiritualists for helping to kill off the scarecrows of superstition, the "old serpent, the devil," and his devilish angels, but I fear there are a good many evils yet to be exorcised from their minds. One thing I notice, the invocations to deity are not half so frequent as in former times, and this is a sign of progression, for I can see no more reason for thanking God for the good in life than for damning him for the bad. I hav heard some very good words from the rostrum, but not better than I hav listened to elsewhere, and it all amounts to about the same. Preachers hav been preaching, poets hav been singing, for ages, yet they can get no higher than that goodness is goodness, and happiness is happiness, and to that end we must ever hope and aspire. The great desideratum is to learn how to liv rightly, and truly, and honestly; to learn the problem of existence, the right kind of existence—

> Man, know thyself—presume not God to scan;
> The proper study of mankind is man.

So it is, and he is always developing the most wonderful and erratic movements and notions, and not the least is the phenomenon of Spiritualism.

I am writing in the midst of a general conversation of a dozen voices, and if I do not close at once I shall certainly go distracted. SUSAN H. WIXON.

Lecturing in August.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In these northern latitudes the Liberal lecturer can work to good advantage, even in dogdays. The old notion that people are too busy to attend lectures in the summer is a fallacy. All things considered, I like summer lecturing better than winter. I hav just closed a series of lectures in Neillsville, Wis. Despite the hot weather, the people came out evening after evening. Judge Dewhurst, wife and daughter, and friends from the East visiting them, were regular attendants. By the way, the judge sent over to me at my hotel, by a Liberal friend, the sum of fifteen dollars, with the laconic message, "Tell Mr. Jamieson there is my contribution for the lectures." With the heavy railroad expenses lecturers hav to meet, such a message is more welcome than a voice from heaven. This is characteristic of the man. Citizens, irrespectiv of belief, respect Judge Dewhurst for his integrity, manly courtesy, and unostentatious benevolence. Need I add that Freethinkers are proud of such a man. He has been for many years an outspoken Infidel. While he is unobtrusiv, he makes no concealment of his views, notwithstanding the fact that he is one of Neillsville's leading business men. For many years he has been a regular subscriber of the Boston Investigator.

Mr. Charles Sniteman followed the judge with ten dollars; W. S. Coville, I. A. Durgin, Alexander Sires, with five dollars each, as the Lord had blessed them with cash; B. Fragsdorf, John Paulis, E. Eilert, James McClannahan, and others sustained the course with one and two dollars each, according to their means.

Neillsville is one of the prettiest little cities I ever saw. Since I gave my first course of lectures there three years ago, it floods itself every night with electric light. The new theater, in which I spoke, was lighted with the Edison electric. Its mellow, soft radiance is a great improvement over the fitful glare of the gas-jets.

I received a call to visit a little village reached by stage, ten miles distant, Maple Works. Gave three lectures. Each night, right in harvest time, too, the attendance grew. The third evening some hung on the balcony outside. One Adventist left in the midst of the lecture. Too much blasphemy for him. I hav an invitation to return and giv a longer course. Could not set time, as I expect to be busy the whole fall and winter in Montana.

Next went to Greenwood, sixteen miles north of Neillsville. A meaner place I never saw. The party who was kind enough to take up some of our notices did nothing further. I had the felicity to ride thirty-two hot, dusty miles by stage, and pay the aforesaid k. p. $1.75 for some very inferior meals. Could not hire a hall, hunted half a day for a church trustee. He could not be found. Had seen the preacher, who referred me to the trustee. Saw the post-master. He gave it as his candid opinion that the people there are not at all favorable to my sort of doctrin. Next morning, as I was leaving in the stage, a gentleman reached up and shook hands, significantly remarking, "Queer people here." Another standing by said, "You must not think we are all that way" I had made no remark.

The word went out that one of the devil's emissaries had come to town, from what I could learn. Greenwood has one business street. It is surrounded by pine stumps. The inhabitants are piously inclined, yet do not support preaching with a generous hand. The preacher is a hard-working blacksmith, and, as he told me himself, "preaches occasionally" in the poorly painted church. There were two fights, I heard, in the little pinched-up Christian town during the day I was there. In former times it tried to grow as large as Neillsville. Oh dear, what egotism! That is about all it has left, except the stumps. I hope I never shall see its like again.

I notice that, although it is August, the Boston Investigator is succeeding in arousing enthusiasm in its lectureship. This is a move in the right direction. L. K. Washburn is one of the ablest speakers in America. I wish we had a thousand lecturers for Freethought where we now hav one. There is an abundance of room for them. No one man can do all the work; no, though there were ten thousand, the talents and methods of all would be different.

By the time this is in type I hope to be in Montana.

The Bible.

It would be a waste of labor to inveigh against the teachings of this venerable book. Alas! too many victims in our state prisons and penitentiaries, languishing in bitter silence, might date their downward steps to vice and crime from their too close imitations of the examples of some of its saints and heroes. Even King David, "the man after God's own heart," could find, no doubt, an excellent imitator in treachery, murder, cruelty, and atrocity! Science and time are adapting it fast enough to suit the public mind. This is the present standing of this once awful Bible, to doubt whose dictum once was sure to doom the doubter to torture or the fiery fagot!

With the Freethinker, it is difficult to decide whether this Judean Bible, with its journalizations, practical picturings, and whimsicalities of an angry, changeable God, is much improvement, if any, on the ten thousand passionate gods and goddesses of the ancient Greeks, Romans, and other barbarians. But of one thing we are certain: the Bible, as it appears before the unbiased, thinking world of to-day, with the lover of ancient romance and the appreciator of grave humor stands higher than it ever did before.

The researches and deductions of Darwin, although not held as positiv evidence to the reasoning mind, are still sufficiently strong to warrant belief in the probability of nature's gradual unfoldment, and a disbelief in the incredible instantaneous creation, as narrated by Moses. Hence, with the downfall of Moses, the downfall of the doctrin, "original sin," and all the necessary machinery of salvation.

In man's growing skepticism in regard to the divine authority of the Bible, the book is not so much to be decried when properly comprehended as are those sanctimonious priests or conventicles who hav ever held its fables, blessings, cursings, anathemas, as horrid bugbears; as shields, from behind which they securely showered their priestly, envenomed arrows, curses, and firebrands! Thus, as the Bible gradually subsides as a theological text-book, it rises in estimation with the lover of truth.

At this correct valuation the Bible has not lost, but gained rapidly, its own legitimate position. And now, as we are permitted without danger to smile and laugh at and admire the various efforts of these Judean romancers, we find many of its fables equal, and in some respects superior, for boldness in conception, to the Arabian Nights, Don Quixote, Baron Trenk, Baron Munchausen, Mark Twain, or Dickens—they are so gravely funny!

This position of the Bible having been fairly achieved, it now becomes the duty of the Freethinker to watch the movements of that class of humanity who call themselvs men of God—the priesthood; men who assume to know all about their God's affairs; what pleases, and what displeases him; the amount of praise, or quality of "taffy" he requires, or can stand, etc. It is this class of men the Freethinker is to fear, watch, and expose; these "blind leaders of the blind," from the Catholic God, the holy "Father" at Rome, through the whole of priesthood's ramifications, down to those street nuisances, "Salvation Armies."

The world probably will ever, or at least for a long period hence, be inflamed with grave priestly assumptions, which to the Liberalized Freethinker only cease to be amusing when some religious organization aims at controlling power. Theological rivalry among the various Christian creeds will for a long period, it is hoped, neutralize their power to do mischief, and the lover of liberty need only be alarmed when priesthood assumes an autocratic form, as now, in the grasping efforts of the holy father at Rome!

How pleasant would be the reflection to the Liberalized Freethinker could he cherish the hope that, at some future period, the world would arrive at that point of intelligence that the whole family of man could be merged in one peaceful brotherhood! This can only be obtained through the spread of universal intelligence among the masses. While in this connection, it forcibly strikes the thinker that this can never be achieved by failing to expose the snaky, hypocritical assumptions of the papal power at Rome. That a creature in this advanced age should be bolstered up to be a God—a deity—by his priestly satellites, and assume to dispense blessings or pronounce cursings on those advocating or opposing his Godship, is truly appalling!

Although to some it may be gravely humorous to read of the recent solemn mummery of transmitting to our republic a something they call a "baretta," it is deeply humiliating to reflect upon and notice the well-trained obsequiousness of Roman Catholicism. Alas! these priestly exhibitions too painfully show to what depths of degradation the human mind can be brought by training. D. BRUCE.

News and Notes.

On Saturday, August 7th, after twenty-five miles' ride alongside the glorious mountains, I arrived at Denver, Queen City of the Plains, and well worthy of that noble title. I was in Denver about a dozen years ago, a minister of the Unitarian society, but it was like a small village then compared to its present size and magnificence. It has grown wonderfully. It is the wealthiest and most elegantly built city between Chicago and San Francisco, and is quite cosmopolitan. People from all parts of the world come here, some for business, some for pleasure and health, and the society is as brilliant as that of New York or Washington. There are seventy-five thousand inhabitants, and they are all on the go, like a Broadway crowd. There is hardly time for a death or a funeral, everything is so lively.

Our Denver friends, in accordance with the imperial nature of their metropolis, did not do things by halves. They secured for the lectures the most magnificent building in the city, Tabor's Grand Opera House, the most beautiful opera house in the country, I think; elegant and tasteful in its decorations, inspiring in its architectural beauty. It is an ornament indeed to the city.

On Sunday afternoon I attended the national convention of locomotiv engineers at the opera house. Addresses were made by Chief Arthur, Governor Eaton, Mayor Bates, and others, and, although the labor question was not thoroughly discussed, some good points were made. I was surprised, however, to find that so intelligent a body of workingmen felt constrained to open all their meetings, both public and private, with prayer. I could see no sense in that, only a superstitious formality, unworthy of those who, by actual experience, hav found out that self-reliance is the first of virtues. The convention was opened with prayer, but it was really laughable when this solemn farce was followed by one of the liveliest pieces of minstrel music ever played by an orchestra. The tambourine came in almost on the heels of the prayer with one of its most festiv jingles, and after this, amid the dancing melody, came the clog dance, sand-paper imitation, to the intense delight of the audience, excepting the chaplain of the hour, who, I believe, never looked so lugubrious. You would hav thought he had lost the golden harp for good and all. He didn't seem to like the mixed nature of the entertainment. Such a close communion of the prayer and jig did not suit his pious mind. However, the audience liked it and clapped their hands. It was ten thousand times more real to them than the hollow utterance of the priest. Theology was entirely knocked out by these strains of secular music.

The good judgment and daring spirit of our Liberal Denverites was vindicated by the splendid audience that greeted me in the evening. About twelve hundred people were present, the largest assemblage I hav yet addressed; and it was a pleasure indeed, in such a temple of beauty, to speak to such appreciativ listeners on the most advanced topics of the day. One is rewarded for a great deal of toil with such an hour of brilliant surroundings. It was like being upon a mountain hight and seeing something of the glory that will be. Mr. Thomas Tross, a most indefatigable worker, who, with Mr. John G. Jenkins, planned and carried out this splendid enterprise, presided at the meeting, and made the introductory address, which felicitously smoothed the way to a hearty reception by the audience. Miss Florence Taussig, one of the finest musical artists in Denver, made my introduction still more pleasant with excellent music, and so I had everything in the occasion to inspire me to do my level best for Freethought. Indeed, my heart goes out to Colorado friends for the noble encouragement they hav given. So far, I hav had only pleasure, and no disappointment. I shall speak again in Denver on Sunday, August 15th, and I look forward to another successful advance. No church in the city could hold the audience I had on Sunday evening. We are beginning to be popular, after all. I shall hav more to say about my Denver friends in my next. They hav done noble service indeed.

On Tuesday I came up to Forks Creek, where I find my good friend B. L. Smith, and his wife and son, Morris, aged three, who, born in the mountain air of liberty, has plenty of go-ahead. He will make a splendid Liberal one of these days, if the laws of heredity prevail. I also met Charles E. Smith, who, in company with his brother, is engaged in the secular pursuit of furnishing passengers with something to eat. Mr. York, the station agent, is also a Liberal, and was born almost within stone's-throw of the granit hills of New Hampshire, where I first saw the light, and so I felt, of course, that we were somewhat akin. He comes from Nashua, where I once drifted in my Unitarian travels. Forks Creek has about four houses. The railroad is upon one side, and the rushing stream upon the other, and overhead tower the two mighty walls of the canyon. There is not much room for a village, but it is the busiest place of its size I hav yet visited. It does an immense amount of traffic, considering that it is only a rod wide. Mrs. B. L. Smith, and her sister, Miss Maggie Campbell, are daughters of that stanch Liberal, Alexander Campbell, of Elk Rapids, Mich., and they are worthy of that honorable descent, and hav no bit of superstition in heart or brain. I had a pleasant time at this mountain hamlet, where Liberalism is triumphant by a "large majority."

I never struck a place quite so lively and varied as Black Hawk. It is the oldest mining camp in the state, and has not lost one bit of its original force. The hills round about are still loaded with ore, and the mills are constantly booming, and the engins keep up their music day and night, and fortune waves its magic wand and people get rich in the twinkling of an eye. Black Hawk, Central City, and Eureka stretch along for miles up and down the gulch, and you do not know when you pass from one to the other. They are really one city, which winds about and over hills and underground like a big serpent. Gilpin county sends forth more gold and silver than any other county in the world. The deeper they dig the more metal they find. The dazzling prospect increases every year rather than diminishes. The fields of discovery are inexhaustible. Gilpin county is the home of politicians. Hill, Tabor, Teller, Belford, and other renowned party leaders hav risen to fame and position from these mountainous gorges. Black Hawk is a curious place. Its main street oftentimes becomes a river three or four feet deep, and horses, mules, teams, and men are hurled along it with tremendous velocity to destruction. In five minutes the sun will shine calmly on the ruins, and dead men are picked up. You can't miss the train at Black Hawk. It rolls over your head on the side-hill, and an hour afterward you can go to the station, a dozen rods off, and take that same train. It crosses and recrosses the city half a dozen times before it reaches the stopping-place. You can't miss it unless you try, for it keeps running before your face.

The track from Black Hawk to Central City is the crookedest in the world. You hav to go four miles in order to travel one mile. Unless you consult the time-table, you don't know whether you are going to Black Hawk or Central City—whether you are riding backward or forward. The more you think about it, the more puzzled you get. It is called the "skylight" railroad, and you might imagin, as you climb over the top of the hills, that you are on the way to the celestial city.

They hav some wonderful railroads in Colorado. They hav one called the Loop beyond Georgetown, where you ride up a canyon seven hundred and fifty feet, going backward and forward in the shape of a figure 8, until you seem to be hanging right above the city, and the head grows dizzy as one looks down hundreds of feet upon the track which but five minutes ago he was traversing. While the locomotiv is going one way the hind car is going another, and it seems as if the train was going in two different directions, and a collision was inevitable. One needs to keep his eyes open when he travels in Colorado. In half a day's journey he will look toward every point in the compass.

I did not lecture as I expected at Idaho Springs, Georgetown, or Central City, but gave three lectures at Black Hawk on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings and Friday evening, Aug. 10th, 11th, and 13th. This arrangement seemed best under the circumstances. I was quite surprised when I entered the hall on the first evening to find a large audience present—every seat was occupied. It was a good opening indeed. Music was not lacking either. Mrs. Eva Hawks Howard, of Boston, a daughter of Mr. Hawks, one of the old residents and business men of Black Hawk, entertained us with the very best that Boston could giv, for she is one of the musical favorits of that city. It was delightful on these far-away hills to shake hands with New England's fair representativ, and hav such beautiful music from the center of art. Of course, under such circumstances, I could not fail to do my level best for Freethought. On the next evening the audience was larger, and also on Friday evening. On Friday evening the Gilpin reed and brass band gave us music, and so we had plenty of good things to enliven our way. George Stroeble is leader of the band. Albert Lintz, Al Newton, Wm. Fick, Milton Fick, Louis Fick, Frank Hughes, Fred Hughes, Ed. Bruburker, Hugh McKinna, and Fred Frensh are its good Liberal members, and I put them on the roll of honor. It will thus be seen that Freethought has had a royal entertainment in this rugged bosom of the Rockies.

Mr. Wm. Germain, who conducted the campaign, knows how to do the work he sets about like an old stager, for he was in this country from the start, and has met with all sorts of fortunes amid its changing scenes. He contributed largely to the success of the lectures by his untiring labors. He has the courage of his convictions, and no prophecies of failure could daunt him. In this first advance for Freethought he has scored a victory.

Mr. A. L. Crosson, of the Black Hawk Times, is one of the most brilliant editors in Colorado, and an outspoken Liberal. His father is one of the leading Freethinkers of Eddyville, Iowa, so well known for its radicalism. He comes of good stock, and makes it tell along this frontier line.

Mr. Matthew Boelert is another glorious Liberal. He is a Hercules in build, and his shoulders are almost as broad as the hills themselvs. He can wield the hammer like God Thor himself. He has the intensity of the Germanic race, and is a vigorous knight of the anvil and can make the sparks fly. It was a pleasure to meet him and his genial wife and children, who enjoy a paradise of Freethought in this breezy country.

Mr. and Mrs. Antoine Merlick's hospitality and liberal home added to the delights of my sojourn. Mr. Merlick was educated for a Catholic priest, and is a finished scholar. But he disdained the church and prefers the independent life of a toiler.

Mr. J. B. Ballard is one of the leading business men of the place, and is a generous supporter of our cause. He is a Liberal in every sense of the word. Mr. Fred Kruse has written for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has made a vigorous fight for Secular principles. When member of the legislature he moved to dispense with the services of a chaplain, and carried the resolution. He is a born Freethinker, and can't help speaking his sentiments, although he is a politician. The man will come out.

I climbed up the steep road beyond Central City and Eureka (with the aid of a horse, of course) to the cosy home of Mrs. R. C. Brewster, ten thousand feet above the sea. Mrs. Brewster is a contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it was a gratification indeed to see her face to face where she breathes the air of liberty in her elevated though not "heavenly" mansion. She is not ready for the latter yet. She walked five miles to attend my lecture and five miles back, and I consider it is a great honor to address such persevering "sinners." Where is the saint who will do any better than that?

I had the pleasure of meeting the first resident of this camp, Mr. E. W. Henderson, who, though he calls himself a Presbyterian, is altogether too cordial and Liberal to be hedged in by any creed. Humanity, after all, is his religion.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Foster, Mr. Samuel Miller, Mr. Richard Mueller, Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Haight, Mr. E. W. Hurlburt, Mr. A. Mansel, Mr. and Mrs. Belcher, Philip Pressler, and many others make a splendid company of liberty-loving men and women in this glorious mountain land.

A Secular Union has been formed with over forty names on the roll. Mr. Wm. Germain is temporary secretary of the organization. It will be ready for the fall campaign.

Christianity has a new argument in its defense. As I was lying in my bunk on Friday morning, meditating whether to get up or not, I heard a voice just outside my door proclaiming, "He's got the cholera morbus. I guess he'll believe in Jesus now." When Christianity relies on Sam Jones and cholera morbus for its chief supporters, it must be pretty far gone.

At my lecture on Friday evening I was interrupted by a voice asking, "How about hell?" I answered, "You will find out when you get there. That is the scientific method. To know a thing you must experience it. There is no doubt but your curiosity will be amply satisfied." The voice said no more.

I met Judge Belford on the train, one of Colorado's brilliant men. He is a pronounced Freethinker. He says there is not much orthodoxy among the miners. They know too much. They not only dig and delve, but read. He took a look at a mining-camp library the other day, and found Homer's Iliad, Virgil's Ænid, Hugo's romances, Huxley, and Darwin. It will not do for preachers to tackle such kind of folks. Not much superstition there. I find that all the churches in a mining camp hav a very dilapidated appearance. They seem to be patiently waiting for the resurrection.

I had the rare experience of riding on the front of the engin in my trip over the Loop. I never realized so much before the glory of the iron horse. How magnificently he swept along! And how it thrilled the blood to be thus spinning forward in mid-air, mounted on the very forehead of the mighty and bellowing steed! For once, I had the absolute joy of radicalism without any drawback—I was at the very front of creation, kicking my heels disdainfully to the "dark backward and abysm of time."

Lecture engagements: Seward, Neb., August 21st, 22d, 23d; Valley Falls, Kan., August 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th; Seneca, Kan., August 29th (instead of Lincoln, Neb.—the appointments at Lincoln and Fremont, Neb., are postponed until fall); West Point, Neb., September 1st, 2d, 3d; Omaha, September 5th; Cromwell, Iowa, September 7th, 8th; Leon, September 9th and 10th; Ottumwa, September 12th; West Union, Iowa, September 14th, 15th, 16th; Chebanse, Ill., September 18th, 19th; Chicago, September 26th; West Union, Ohio, October 1st, 2d, 3d.

P. S.—Fifteen hundred people were at my second lecture in Denver. The opera house was packed; it was the largest Freethought audience ever assembled in the city, except at Ingersoll's lectures. It shows the splendid Liberalism of the West. The daily papers gave several columns to reports of the lecture.

MR. PUTNAM ON THE CONVENTION.

I inclose my contribution for the New York state Freethinkers' Convention. I wish I could be there, but I must continue the work in this Western country till October. I hope every Freethinker in New York will come, or, if he can't come, then send something for the expenses. I think this summer picnic will be a refreshment indeed, and as the national Congress does not meet until November this Convention comes at the right time to prepare one for the solid fall and winter campaign. I look forward to a grand success with our indefatigable worker, C. B. Reynolds, at the front. He is just the man, and I hope that all the Liberals of the Empire State will giv him generous aid, versus Old—not New—Jersey "justice." SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Pennsylvania Secular Union.

Sections 2 and 3 of article 3 of the constitution of the Pennsylvania Secular Union set forth the objects of that society as follows:

To advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of public funds for religious institutions or purposes of any kind; the abrogation of state-paid chaplainicies; the substitution of simple affirmation, under the pains and penalties of perjury, for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of a purely secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state. Section 3. To weld together in a close bond of union, not only all the Secular societies, but all the Secularists, in the state of Pennsylvania, for mutual encouragement, aid, and protection; and to defend through the courts any citizen of the state whose equal religious rights are denied, or who is oppressed on account of any opinion he or she may hav held or expressed on the subject of religion.

With such objects in view the state society should receive the hearty support and cooperation of every lover of universal mental liberty within its bounds. At the last annual convention the president, Prof. William Seymour, of Philadelphia, was elected state lecturer and organizer, and intended to make a thorough canvass of the state, lecturing and organizing a society wherever Liberals enough could be found. But unfortunately a severe and protracted sickness prevented the accomplishment of his designs.

With returning health, the president intends to inaugurate an activ campaign, and desires the coöperation of every Secularist in the state. To this end the next annual convention of the Pennsylvania Secular Union will be held at Pittsburgh, Pa., on Sunday, September 19th, at Maltby Hall, 76 Fifth ave.

Representativs of every organized society and individual delegates from localities where the Secular element is not organized are urged to attend; especially is the presence of the Executiv Committee desirable. The Pittsburgh Secular Society will aid to the extent of its ability in making the convention a success.

Able speakers are engaged. Now, friends, come up and let us put our shoulders to the wheels of progress. Correspondents will please communicate with Mr. Seymour at once in reference to lectures to enable him to arrange his route.

WILLIAM SEYMOUR, president.
HARRY HOOVER, secretary.

Canadian Notes.

A four-weeks' vacation down on old Cape Cod, among the friends and associations of some twenty years ago; a consequent breaking up, for the time, of regular habits; together with hot weather, an unusual rush of business, and a general dearth of anything like Secular work in this part of the country, must be my excuse for a perhaps unpardonably protracted silence; but with the advent of cooler weather, and the opening of the lecture season—which takes place in a few weeks—I hope to be able once more to get into the old harness.

The annual convention of the Canadian Secular Union will be held at Science Hall, Toronto, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, September 10th, 11th, and 12th, when measures will be introduced by which it is hoped fresh interest will be aroused, and a season of useful work inaugurated.

President Algie will be on hand, with other members of the Alton branch, and a number of friends from other parts of the country are expected. Mr. Burnham will also be present to assist in the work of the convention, and will lecture on the evening of the 12th. These arrangements are perhaps a little unfortunate as to the time appointed—being on the dates of the last three days of the New York Convention—but this difficulty could not be avoided, as we are obliged to hold our meeting during the time of the fall exhibition, to giv the country friends the benefit of the cheap railroad rates.

Mr. Watts is expected to arrive in Toronto Saturday, August 28th, and will open the lecture season the day following, Sunday the 29th; subject, "Secularism: Past, Present, and Future." On Monday, the 30th, he givs a political lecture; subject, "Gladstone's Defeat and the Irish Question; What Does it Mean?"—which, being at present the all-absorbing question, ought to fill the house. On the following Sunday, Sept. 5th, he again lectures, this time on the interesting question of "Saints or Sinners—Which?" After which he goes to the States, where he expects to be kept busy for some months.

Mr. Burnham follows a week later, lecturing, as above stated, on Sunday, Sept. 12th, and possibly for some weeks after. This gentleman closed our last lecture season, giving three Sunday lectures which were among the best ever delivered in Toronto. He has made a host of friends here, and we hope to be able to hav him with us often. His lecture on "The Philosophy of the Religious Emotions" is one that certainly ought to be published and in the hands of all Secularists (and, for that matter, of all Christians); it contains a solution of the whole scheme of religious delusion from a physiological and psychological standpoint, and there could be no better document to settle the doubts of a skeptic, or to strengthen the hands of a veteran. There hav been numerous inquiries as to where it could be obtained, and there is no doubt it would sell well in Canada.

I hav received several inquiries re the Affirmation bill of which I spoke some months ago. It seems that the news at that time was a little premature. The bill was passed, as stated, by a large majority in the Dominion Parliament, and everybody, including the daily papers, thought that it would pass the Senate and become law; but that body, which is analogous to the English House of Lords, and about as useful, saw fit, in their infinit wisdom, to throw it out, and the measure was killed for the time being; but I hav been assured by good authority that it will come up again during the next session under circumstances which will make its being passed by both houses certain.

I may also state, in reply to the inquiring friends, that the bill was introduced by the member from Hamilton, Ont., not from Secular motivs, but on the ground upon which nearly every judge of the Queen's Bench in Ontario is in favor of it, and that is, in the interest of religion. They see wholesale perjury in every court in the country, and to prevent the evil, or to protect and shield their deity from reproach, they favor the passing of an Affirmation bill. But, no matter what their motivs are, if the measure is passed the result will be more to the benefit of Secularists than Christians. KANUCK.

Toronto, Aug. 20, 1886.

Canadian Secular Union.

To the Freethinkers of Canada:

The constitution of the Canadian Secular Union declares that an annual convention of Canadian Freethinkers shall be held in Toronto in the month of September. In accordance with this declaration, the central executiv of the said association hereby earnestly invites all Freethinkers throughout the Dominion to attend our next convention, to be held in Toronto, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, September 10th, 11th, and 12th, in Science Hall, the new hall of the Toronto Secular Society, Adelaide street east, opposit Victoria street.

Business of importance will be introduced that will affect every Canadian Freethinker, and hav an important bearing on the future welfare of our organization.

Efforts are being made to secure the attendance of Mr. Charles Watts, who is now en route to this country from England—and also ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw, Mich. The committee of arrangements will endeavor to provide a program that will interest and entertain all who attend. The Toronto Industrial Exposition will be held September 6th to 18th, and all who wish to attend our convention can purchase return tickets to Toronto at half-fare.

The executiv wish it to be distinctly understood that this appeal is made to all Freethinkers of the various provinces, whether they belong to any local organization or not.

Intimations from friends intending to be present, and all communications relating to the convention, should be sent direct to the president or secretary.

J. A. RISSER.

Pioneers of the Gospel of Humanity.

The Executiv Committee hav invited Joseph Cilley, of Nottingham, N. H., the first antislavery man sent to the United States Senate on that issue, to be present at the White Sulphur Springs Convention. Mr. Cilley is ninety-six years old, but talks of the old-time political struggles with remarkable clearness and energy, and it is hoped he may be able to attend. But that courageous and sturdy champion of equal rights and liberty for all, regardless of sex, race, or color, Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, who did such noble service in the days that tried men's souls, will positivly be present at the Convention, and giv her "Reminiscences in the Life of a Reformer."

Let every lover of humanity make a special effort to attend. It will be well for us all to drink in of the spirit of zeal and self-sacrifice of the venerable pioneers of the gospel of humanity.

Mr. Tucker's Protuberant Modesty.

From Liberty.

Any expert in typography will tell Mr. Green that neither the Independent nor the Christian Union comes within gunshot of Liberty in beauty of dress and make-up, and neither surpasses it in literary power. Yet Liberty's circulation is only one-tenth of ten thousand. After this comparison, only my excessiv modesty keeps me from adding that taste, knowledge, and brains—not money—are the essentials in the achievement of typographical and literary excellence.

W. F. JAMIESON gave four open-air lectures in Merrillan, Wis., on grounds fitted up with seats for the congregation. His fourth lecture, on "Anarchism, America's Worst Foe," had the best attendance, and there was a general expression that every word of the lecture ought to be published and widely circulated. When last heard from, he was giving three lectures in Augusta, Wis., in the opera house, to fair-sized audiences. Address at Lake City, Minn.

Communications.

A Voice from Queensland, Australia.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: With fraternal greetings from this far-off corner of the world, sunny Queensland, I send you tidings of your co-worker in the diffusion of truth, Dr. J. L. York, who, together with Mrs. York, has been doing good, substantial work here for the past three or four months, causing great consternation, and creating great havoc in the orthodox ranks with the bomb-shells of Liberal and radical truth which he has thrown in their midst. He has lectured here every Sunday night to crowded and enthusiastic audiences, and has just gone through a six-nights' debate with a champion of Christianity, Mr. H. A. Long, of Glasgow, Scotland, the champion Infidel-exterminator (hater) who came out here purposely to stem the tide of Infidelity which is sweeping like a mighty wave over the Australasian colonies—but so far he has not caused a ripple on that wave, but has rather helped our cause by being the means of bringing numbers to the debates who would not go to hear a Free-thought lecture alone, but were forced to hear what Dr. York had to say in reply to Mr. Long—who showed himself a cute, tricky, scurrilous, and insulting debater in every sense of the word, whilst Dr. York conducted himself as a gentleman throughout, which even the Christian body was forced to acknowledge. The whole of the debates are being published in book form, a copy of which will, no doubt, reach you, and which will giv you all particulars concerning them without me occupying your valuable space with particulars in this letter. Mr. Long has a habit of addressing remarks personally to individuals in the audience, and, seeing one lady whispering to another while he was speaking during one of the debates, in which he had been opposing Dr. York on evolution, said, "There is no doubt that the lady who is misbehaving herself in front there came from the gorilla." Immediately the house echoed again with hisses, which continued until he left the platform. That was a specimen of his Christian behavior, publicly insulting a lady in that manner. The next day this same lady met Mr. Long in the street, stopped him, and said, "I am the lady you called a gorilla last night; will you please tell me what sort of an animal your mother was?" I guess he thought she was one with him there. However, it ended in his disgusting many of his Christian supporters, and the adding of numbers of thinkers to our ranks. Dr. York will tell you when he returns to America that he was surprised to find this colony so progressiv, and that he had no idea there were so many radicals here. I do not believe there is any part of the world where there are so many Liberals, according to the population, as in the Australian colonies.

Dr. York delivers two more lectures here, and then proceeds on a tour through the colony, away up the North, over a stretch of about 3,000 miles there and back. Having been over the country several times before, I hav agreed to accompany Mr. and Mrs. York as "pilot," and will, with your permission, drop you a line or two from different stages of our journey. I shall not tell you much about the country, as I expect the doctor will want to tell you all about that when he gets back to America, but just chronicle a little of the work done, the ground broken up, and the seed sown, the fruits of which others will reap who come after. So far as Brisbane is concerned, I am glad to be able to say that Dr. York's visit has been a great success financially, as well as otherwise.

A very successful musical, literary, and social entertainment was held in the Academy of Music last Friday night, June 25th, under the auspices of the Free-thought Association of this city (quite a healthy body, by the by), to bid farewell to Dr. York. The hall was tastefully decorated, and on the stage was a banner, on which was beautifully illuminated the motto of Thomas Paine, "The world is my country, to do good my religion." After a number of choice selections rendered by a really first-class orchestra, and a few songs by the leading professional talent of the city, came the event of the evening—a presentation to Dr. York. This was a memento of the good feeling of the Freethinkers of Brisbane to Dr. York, and I am sure nothing could hav been thought of more appropriate, or that would hav pleased Dr. and Mrs. York better, than the present they received. It consists of an emu egg, mounted in solid silver. The design is an exquisit one, and is very representativ of this colony. The egg is firmly clasped endwise between two large tree ferns standing on a pedestal of ebony; underneath the egg, between the two trees, is a groundwork of silver representing a forest scene, the trees and grass being very artistically and neatly executed. There is the figure of a black fellow in the act of throwing a spear at a kangaroo which he had taken by surprise, as the animal's startled, upright position indicates. The workmanship displayed in these figures is admirable, the features of the black fellow and the attitude of the kangaroo being exceptionally good. On the top of the egg is an emu, an exact representation in silver of the kind of bird that laid the egg upon which it stands. On the front of the egg is a shield, upon which is inscribed: "Presented to Dr. and Mrs. York, by the Freethinkers of Brisbane, June 25, 1886." The trophy was designed and made at a local jeweler's here in Brisbane, and reflects considerable credit on Mr. Reynolds's skilful workmanship; it will compare with anything of the kind produced in any other part of the world. When I tell you the trophy is twelve inches high, and about the same in width, and that, with the exception of the stand and egg, it is of solid silver, you may guess it is both very handsome and valuable. It will be something novel for friends to look at when Dr. York returns, and let us hope it will act as a link connecting the land of the emu and kangaroo to that of the eagle and stars-and-stripes, in the mind of Dr. York, in years to come. Mr. W. Widdop, one of the pioneers of Freethought here, made the presentation in a few appropriate words. Dr. York received the gift with a suitable expression of his feelings, and paid a tribute to the appropriate design.

The program of the evening was then proceeded with, including the trial scene from "The Merchant of Venice," which was most creditably rendered by members of the Association, Mrs. Fish (a lady at whose nuptials Dr. York had the honor of assisting, the day after his arrival here) being especially worthy of commendation for her rendering of the character of Portia. The hall was then cleared, and a most pleasant evening concluded by dancing into the small hours of the morning.

That Dr. York's visit has done an immense amount of good to the cause of Freethought here no one can doubt. Whole families hav left the churches, and numbers of new members hav joined the Association. An impetus has been given to the children's lyceum, which has been regularly attended every Sunday morning by Mrs. York, and the material is here with which to make as good a lyceum as anywhere in the colonies. A little different management, reorganization, some new blood in the shape of teachers, and more exercise, drilling, calisthenics, and less talk and lecturing, of which the children get too much and become wearied, and then the school will flourish and prosper, and thus will be formed a band of young workers who will be able to take the places of the elders when they pass on from material sight. Altogether, this city will hold its own with any of the cities of the South, from a Liberal standpoint, and no American should come to Australia and leave it without going North, at least as far as Brisbane, which (let me observe, for the information of some of our American cousins who do not seem to be very geographically correct concerning the whereabouts of Australian cities) is the capital city of Queensland, the northern colony of Australia, and not in New Zealand, as some imagin.

I am writing this after returning from Dr. York's farewell lecture, which he has just delivered in the Academy of Music, the largest hall in Brisbane, which was packed from floor to ceiling by the largest audience that (notwithstanding that he has lectured here for four months) has yet assembled to hear him. I wish all those Christians who hav been so bitter against us in this city had been there to see what effect Mr. H. A. Long's anti-Infidel campaign has had upon the Infidel body. We know the effect these Freethought lectures hav had upon the Christian body, because a large number in that audience to-night were members of one of the Christian churches only a few weeks ago, but now they are out-and-out Infidels and Freethinkers.

How many converts hav the supporters of Mr. Long gained from our ranks to the Christians? I think not one; and as this sort of thing is going on throughout the civilized world, it shows the progressiv car of Secularism is moving rapidly on, riding Juggernaut-like over the obstacles that are thrown under its wheels. The subject of Dr. York's last lecture in Brisbane to-night was "Reason and Facts versus Romanism, the Auricular Confession, the Blight of the Intellect, and the Curse of the World," a very fitting subject to terminate with, and to leave the people here with something to think over. Dr. York said he had been speaking of the daughters all along until to-night, but that to-night he was speaking of the mother; he had been lopping off the branches, but it was the trunk of the tree that would be the hardest to destroy, the last to die, and it would die hard. The Protestant churches could not fight Romanism, because Romanism was the mother of Protestantism, which was the same only a little diluted; but the fight fell to the Secularists, who, with science at their back, would in time uproot and destroy all the superstitions, and expose and sweep away all the vile and filthy corruptions of the Romish church, as they were doing with the Protestant churches. Before the lecture commenced there were some selections by an orchestra composed of some of the leading professional instrumentalists of the city; then a song by Miss Alice St. John, one of the leading sopranos of Australian opera houses; another song by Mr. Barrington, who gave the "Death of Nelson" in a manner that only artists like himself are capable of; a violin solo by Professor Lindsell, in his usual excellent style, and then the lecture—altogether combining to make this last evening exceedingly pleasant, and one that will be long remembered by the Liberals of Brisbane.

Day after to-morrow we proceed to Toowoomba, a town about one hundred miles from here, by rail. Dr. York givs three lectures there; then we return to Brisbane, and commence the northern journey by steamer; but, not to anticipate, we will leave these places until they come in proper order to be written about.

The audience to-night were loth to part with Dr. York, and many a hearty hand-shake did both he and Mrs. York receive. Over and over again has he been asked to stay on, to stay altogether if he liked, and they would insure him the same continual support. So you see how near you come losing him. He has now made a lengthier stay in the Australian colonies than he expected, but he has not yet been long enough away to be forgotten by you, but will, I am certain, receive that hearty welcome on his return home that I saw by The Truth Seeker you promised him some time ago. I sincerely trust he will continue to enjoy the same sound health he now has, and that he will arrive back safely, and liv to make that promised trip "East," when he will be able to tell you all about this strange land of topsy-turvey wonders.

Geo. Smith.

Hints to Workingmen.

The fear has been expressed that in the event of separate political action of the labor element the designing political hacks will insinuate themselvs into the organization, and, either by person or proxy, dominate its influence to their own selfish ends. This may be avoided by nominating for office none but men who work for wages, known and verified to be honest and capable. The curse of politics are the demagogs. No more detestable vermin infest the earth. They play upon the passions and prejudices, arousing the first and conceding to the latter, poising like an acrobat on the rope of popular approval, their only aim being to walk its length straight into an office where the salary is good and the stealings better. And, to our discredit be it said, they get there. They must get there no longer. We do not need them. A country that is self-governed should not tolerate professional politicians, and year after year elect them to make laws and govern it. In what essential particular do we differ from a monarchical government if we foist upon ourselvs a "governing class," and let them rule us to suit their own interests? The iron rod of despotism is the same inflexible master, be it wielded by one man or a thousand; and there is no despotism more heartless, cold, and cruel than that of our aristocracy of money. They own the politicians who are successful. They buy themselvs seats in the United States Senate, and then bribe their fellow-members to vote in their interest. They would steal the earth if they could get to some other planet with it, just to astonish the nativs with the immensity of their possessions. That a certain class of men should hav their vanity fed at the expense of the toiling masses is monstrous. Certain it is that there are radical defects in our political economy which make it possible for such an iniquity to exist. But it will not be remedied by "pledges" from candidates of either party, be they made in good faith or not, because all legislation at present in this country is under the pernicious dominion of capital. It is supreme. That influence must be rooted out altogether, and if we can elect honest and capable men to fill the offices and make laws, we must stand by them in the hard fight they will hav against the corrupt influence of money. Let the more intelligent among us leave no effort untried to show our comrades how suicidal it is to sell for a mere temporary benefit their voice and vote to the reckless, unprincipled demagogs who, like the slave-drivers of old, whip them in, by fair means or foul, to signing away for a mess of pottage the valuable gifts of American citizenship. Elections, at best, as they hav been in the past, hav decided no principle. Men hav been put up by the political boss and the voters told to vote for them, and they hav done so. In one instance, a very rich man paid thirty thousand dollars for a seat in Congress. He was a man who was notorious for his grasping cupidity, unprincipled, very close in his dealings with his men, a Democrat in politics, and an aristocrat in society. To advance his own interests, nothing was too low, mean, or despicable, and this man, with an eye single only to the rolling up of additional millions, was sent to Congress. To represent who, or what? To represent himself and get back his thirty thousand dollars spent on his election. The idea of such a man pretending to represent a democratic constituency, who for the most part were workingmen, is like sending Lord Salisbury to a council of nations to represent Ireland. I would that I could in some way get the interested attention of every wage-worker in this land, and, getting that, set him to thinking on the subject of the mistakes he has made and is liable to make in casting his vote.

The workingmen hav elected a Congress who allowed 20,857,000 acres of land to pass into the hands of twenty-nine foreign corporations, ninety per cent of the total purchase being held by Englishmen. It is estimated that Englishmen own land in America equal to the entire extent of Great Britain and Ireland. Possibly it may be their intention to portion it off in large estates, bring over some few of their white-slave farmers, whom they allow to make from three to four dollars a week, and add to their number from nativ recruits here at the same benevolent pay. It seems as if they had set out to buy up the whole country—at least, the largest area of it. And it is very apparent that if they own the lands they will own the people that may, by force of circumstances, be obliged to liv on their land. It will be England over again; they will exact the last cent above starvation point from settlers and tenants. That is their game, no doubt. The "governing class" must, "don't you see," hav magnificent estates, lordly manors, hundreds of retainers, pleasure yachts, boundless supply of ready money, and how are they going to get it, "don't you know," if the lower orders don't hand it up to them with due reverence and proper humility? Quite the proper thing, "don't you see?" If any members of the lower class get starved out in their attempt to keep up the style of "me lord," it's quite of no consequence, because you see there's got to be rich and there's got to be poor, and they never will be missed there's such a lot of 'em. Besides, it's God's will. "Servants, obey your masters." Honor the king. If we could get the workingmen to do a turn for themselvs, we could elect a Congress that would put such a tax upon unoccupied land that "me lord" would drop it as quick as the devil would holy water. And this must be done. What with the aping of everything English by our sapient dudes, and the exchange of our maidens with money-bags for titles, these large purchases of land look as if we were going to hav England thrust down our throats at all hazards. Now, workingmen, do you want this country turned into a monarchy? If not, rouse up and vote for honest men from among yourselvs. It is not necessary to call it a monarchical government to hav one, and if any man cannot see that we are drifting in that direction he must be blind indeed.

WM. ALLEN SMITH.

Theory and Practice.

The theory set forth by Mr. W. A. Smith that the remedy for evils that beset the workingmen—i.e., the masses—lies in the ballot-box is very beautiful, but it rests upon the hypothesis that honesty is an attribute of the workingmen, and is accidental or rare among the upper classes, whatever they are.

Honesty, like many other virtues, is comparativ and hence variable.

Fidelity to the general interests of the people must exist among the people before the ballot can be an effectual correctiv.

A venal people brings into power mercenary rulers.

Individual honesty rarely has sufficient tenacity to withstand the strain of official environment.

Therefore, something more potent than official honesty is needed to regulate official acts.

What is wanted is obedience to the wishes of the people, under constitutional restrictions, as expressed in party platforms framed by the people in their primaries, and in unequivocal terms; and obedience must be made the only safe policy for officials to pursue.

Chicago Secular News.

The "judicial farce," the trial of the Anarchists, is near its termination. Mr. Foster will finish his argument Monday morning, and Captain Black, in a two-days' speech, will conclude the labors for the defense. State's Attorney Grenell will speak (or howl) for the prosecution, and it is expected that the case will be given to the jury by Thursday. The eight defendants were indicted for murder, and separate indictments were made for conspiracy, riot, etc. They were supposed to be tried on the indictment charging them with the murder of Mathias J. Deegan, but the state has not made a single point connecting them with that affair. They hav tried them for everything but murder—Anarchism, Communism, and Socialism—and a great social salmagundi they hav made of it; they hav piled up testimony on "conspiracy," yet every movement, every utterance, has been known to the public for years; but conspiracy is like the "flowers that bloom in the spring," it has "nothing to do with the case." They hav tried them for reading and circulating Most's books on revolutionary warfare, not realizing that Most is not on trial; they hav rung in the most inflammatory utterances of the Arbeiter Zeitung and Alarm, all testimony which, under the ruling of any fair-minded judge, would hav been excluded; they hav tried them for bomb-making, yet we never hav seen the statute which makes bomb-making a capital crime. From a legal point of view it makes no difference whether Lingz made one or a million bombs a day. They hav tried to prove that their utterances for five or six years were a species of war against society—then why were they not punished for that at the time? They found that all this could not convict them of being accessories to murder unless they could prove the principal was among them; so they put on the stand a notorious tramp—a man who has been tried for blackmailing, for thieving, for arson, and burglary; who is known to hav stolen six hundred dollars from a physician, now deceased; and five hundred people could easily be got to swear that they would not believe him under oath. He's a constitutional liar. He swore that he saw Spies light the bomb. That made a principal of him. It was simply an afterthought. If the jury are not bought, his testimony will not hav a feather's weight, for he looks the lowlived liar that he is. Judge Gary has made rulings in this case that entitle him to rank with the infamous Jeffrey.

The resources of the state, backed by corporate monopolies, hav been freely used by the prosecution. The press has fairly seethed with venom, and one who knows says those papers hav been furnished by the bailiffs to the jury just as they are printed, regardless of the fact that it was ordered that all reference to the case should be cut out. Witnesses for the defense hav been spirited away; some hav been so frightened by intimidation that they refused to testify to what they formerly had volunteered to giv in evidence. Witnesses for the state sat in the court-room, while those for the defense were kept in an anteroom, where detectivs, also pretending to be witnesses for the prisoners, tried to worm out of them important points. The state presented testimony about everything but the murder, for they had not a particle of evidence on that except Gilmer's testimony. But the court primed down the defense to direct testimony—no hearsay evidence was permitted. The case for the state was nothing else. Chief of Police Eborsold, who gave special and positiv orders to Captain Bonfield on the evening of May 4th "not to interfere with that meeting," skips out of town. They say they don't know whether he is in Maine or California. It is known that just before the attack a man entered the Desplaines street station and said to Bonfield, "That meeting is about to break up." Bonfield quickly called his men together, and said, "Let's hurry up and giv them something." The party who offered to testify to that was so frightened by police intimidation that he refused to either go on the stand or testify. He was not the only one almost frightened out of his wits. Friends and sympathizers with the accused hav been dogged and hounded by the police and excluded from the court-room. When demanding admittance yesterday to the court, I was informed that "neither Captain Black nor nothing on earth could get you in. If you want to know why, go to the sheriff. We hav strict and positiv orders to keep you out of the building." As George Schilling was with me, he, too, was barred out. We got in, nevertheless, which pleased me more than a little. It would take up the entire TRUTH SEEKER to enumerate the great and small villainies which hav been perpetrated during this most damnable conspiracy ever hatched by American authorities to convict men of a capital crime of which they are innocent because they were guilty of something else; and how the authorities hav sought out the places where labor reformers were employed and urged the discharge of those persons who dared own they were Socialists; and, I am sorry to say, with remarkable success; but I hav yet to see the Socialist whose opinions hav been changed by this sort of persecution. The state's attorney took it on himself to see about my case, and was at our office bright and early, before the opening of court, one morning last week. So far I know he did not succeed, nor is he likely to. I am given to understand that he threatens my arrest. What for, I am at loss to determin, but as it is the same thing with a number now in jail, it is not out of the probabilities. If those on trial are convicted, there will be wholesale arrests, in my opinion. Somebody suggested to me on Saturday that if those men are convicted the Socialists had better stampede. Well, I don't propose to stampede.

Half a dozen candidates for initiation breathed the close and stuffy atmosphere of a lodge anteroom on one of the hottest nights in July, while the examining officer of a secret labor society put to them the preliminary questions, the first of which was:

"Do you believe in God?"

All readily answered in the affirmativ this great conundrum which "no fellow can find out," and the interrogatory was repeated to the writer. My reply was:

"Not much!"

The officer, being slightly acquainted, desired to be conciliatory, so he mildly suggested:

"I suppose you believe in a supreme being?"

"Not by a jugful," was my irreverent response.

Some of the other candidates turned as pale as Paris plaster; the eyes of one protruded so that I was slightly alarmed for his mental balance; on another it brought out the beads of perspiration, as though he was undergoing a foretaste of an adverse hereafter from an orthodox standpoint. To relieve their distress, I recommended the officer to go in for proper instructions, as those questions were unnecessary. Being a member of the "mother church," the examiner appeared both cross and confused, but obeyed.

Returning, he apologized for asking the questions, saying they were immaterial, but he had an old book.

Still, I remember the time when superstition had a powerful basis in the early history of that society. The same interrogations were then a part of the initiation, and a good deal worse further on. No more satisfactory answers were given by me at that time; the initiation was suspended, yet I was declared a member. Once inside, I endeavored to make it easier for all Freethinkers who should wish to join thereafter, and commenced the agitation for secularizing the order, and thus succeeded in being vilified throughout its ramifications; but the end was soon accomplished, and the religious test in the largest labor organization in the world was abolished.

The above is written to show what can be done by a little effort. In the same organization were men just as opposed to orthodoxy (on the outside) as myself, but they viewed this initiatory business as a lot of buncombe to catch fools, and they acquiesced in the foolishness; did not think it worth while to oppose it. That is not my idea. By such foolishness society is ruled and robbed. The silence of tacit admission that you believe such trash givs its adherents the right to reckon you of their number, and to demand support, patronage, and protection in proportion.

My grand old colleague, John McIntosh, who is a moral hero every inch of him, falls into the error that, because he is familiar with Socialism, he is therefore authority on the Knights of Labor. That is a great mistake. He will admit that I know something of both. Powderly is what is termed a "conscientious Catholic;" he believes his first duty is to the church; and whenever the church wishes to use him to destroy liberty it will do it, under the pretense that the glory of God demands it. That is mighty poor "compass" for freedom. Powderly has also grown vain; the capitalistic press has tickled him. He has held office six years, and that is long enough. That Powderly, when elected General Master Workman, had any authority from the Executiv Board to lay its "innermost secrets" before a Catholic tribunal, is false. As chairman of that Executiv Board, I know no such permission was given. The secretary, at that time, of the Board was Philip Van Patten, and neither he nor I would hav tolerated such action. I know that officers, individually, did ask the opinion and good offices of the church for the success of the order, but without authority.

Our Secular Union will renew its meetings the first Sunday in September. A business meeting of members will be held next Sunday, August 22d, at 245 West Madison street, at 7 P.M. All TRUTH SEEKER readers in Chicago should be present.

Mr. W. S. Bell's Opinion of Newspapers.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The long trial of the Anarchists is now near its end. The great excitement produced by the bomb-throwing at Haymarket square last May has died out, and now Chicago is dull and without a sensation. So greatly inflamed has public sentiment been in this city for some time past over hotly-contested elections, strikes, riots, and the Haymarket affair that now the commonplace occurrences no longer interest the people, and the newspapers are suffering accordingly. Our dailies gloat over horrid crimes and frighful catastrophes. They are intent upon a wide circulation of their pandering sheets, because it circulates within their grasp big piles of the circulating medium. In the dearth of catastrophes and bloody riots they try to make as much as possible out of murders, elopements, etc., but these are too tame and common to satisfy the morbid sentiments of a vast number of those who hav been long fed upon recitals of blood-curdling atrocities. And what is true of our dailies is true of the dailies of all the large cities. What are we going to do about it?

Do not the people make the press what it is, and does not the press make the people what they are? The best thing we who call ourselvs Liberals can do is to giv our hearty support to our Liberal papers. We should not only read THE TRUTH SEEKER, but sustain it with our subscription. I fear too many borrow it who are able to pay for it, and feel no obligation to sustain the cause of liberty by supporting its papers.

I am making arrangements for a lecture trip next October through Missouri and Texas. I hope to visit the following places in Missouri: Hannibal, Edina, Kirkville, Cleopatra, Chillicothe, Montrose, Lamar, Liberal, Carthage, and Joplin. In Texas I shall try to reach Denison, Sherman, Dallas, Kerens, Fort Worth, Granbury, Kimball, Meridian, Morgan, Temple, Walnut Springs, Bellton, Austin, New Braunfels, Houston, Navasota, Corsicana, Moscow, Henderson, Longview, Cooper, Bowie, Montague, Henrietta, and perhaps a few other towns. I am corresponding with many Liberals in these states, and I hope before October to hav my arrangements completed.

Liberalism.

The following appears to be from an earnest, but young, truth seeker:

"OAKLAND, ILL., July 14, 1886.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was conversing with a Methodist minister awhile ago, and he says Infidelity should hold its tongue until we can get up a God superior to his. This certainly can be done; but, to tell you the truth, I hav never as yet read the fundamental principles—the catechism—of Infidelity. Hav you any such book—an Infidel catechism or creed? If not, get one up quick. Let me know immediately. This minister says we are tearing down all the time, and never building up. How is it? If no other way, tell us in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Respectfully, J. W. BENOIT."

The writer of the foregoing labors under an imperfect comprehension of what Liberalism is. Certainly Liberalism will set up no god in place of the dethroned Jehovah, nor establish a creed to replace those it destroys. A catechism is usually boiled-down dogmatism, and we doubt its utility. Even a statement of principles, set forth as authoritativ, can be and should be questioned. Liberalism stands only for Freethought, absolutely and completely, upon all subjects. Of course, this must allow an immense amount of ignorant, wrong, and unscientific thought, but that can only be remedied by scientific education and mental training. But Liberalism nevertheless is free thought, without coercion by priests or politicians, through fear of "God" or a policeman's club.

All this, however, is not to say that Liberalism has no affirmations, as well as negations. Liberalism affirms all truth, and denies nothing but falsehood. In this it is in direct opposition to Christianity, whose affirmations are nearly all falsehoods. The fundamental affirmations of Christianity are: 1. That there is a God in the shape of a man. 2. That this anthropomorphic God created the universe about six thousand years ago. 3. That he also created animal life, ending with man. 4. That this man and his wife were created perfect. 5. That they fell. 6. Through their fall all men were filled with an irresistible desire to do wrong. 7. That all the people in the world did do wrong, and were drowned, except one family. 8. That when the earth was again populated by this family the people continued to do wrong. 9. That, in order to save any, it was necessary for this God to send his only begotten son to be sacrificed. 10. That this son was born of the Virgin Mary, was crucified under Pontius Pilate, was dead and buried, rose again after three days, and ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of this God. 11. That it is necessary to believe this in order to escape an eternity of burning in a fiery lake.

Such, in brief, are the Christian affirmations. It is needless to repeat that every one of them is a falsehood.

The negations of Liberalism consist in a denial of the dogmatic creedal affirmations of Christianity, as contained in the foregoing, and of as much of the theological superstructure erected thereon as conflicts with reason, with science, and with that humanity, or love for the race, inherent in every heart. Liberalism's affirmations, from which we are asked to construct a creed, are as broad as the universe, and include every ascertained law of nature, every proved fact in the world, every known truth upon every known subject. Liberalism has three sides, a scientific side, a destructiv side, and a constructiv side. Liberalism maintains that it must be through scientific methods that truth in regard to all phenomena can be known, and it accepts the conclusions of science so far as demonstrated. Upon these conclusions, and proceeding upon scientific methods, it demonstrates the falseness of Christianity and the truths of nature. Its destructiv side is confined to destroying beliefs founded upon these falsehoods of the church, which are founded upon ignorance of natural law, upon wrong conceptions of the motions of the universe, upon childish ideas of supernatural governance, and which hav been perpetuated through the same general ignorance and for the benefit of priests and "God-appointed" kings.

In its constructiv principles Liberalism embodies both science and humanity. That is, it conducts its humane work upon scientific principles. Affirming first the supremacy of human reason and the universality of law, Liberalism indorses evolution as a fundamental truth, as against the special creation affirmed by Christianity, and, working for this, endeavors to aid in that progress of the world which has been constantly going on since the first savage crawled out of his cave and built himself a hut. As this world is, if not the only world we shall ever see, at least of primal importance, Liberalism devotes itself to making it better, to making men and women happier, and to reducing the sum total of misery by which we are surrounded. As Mr. J. D. Shaw puts it, Liberalism seeks first and above all to glorify man instead of God; to save him from vice, ignorance, and superstition instead of from hell; to teach him how to liv instead of preparing him for death; how to secure homes on earth instead of mythical mansions in the sky; and to rely upon himself and upon work instead of upon God and prayer. Liberalism teaches morality upon a utilitarian instead of an authoritativ basis, and commands people to do right because thereby their own happiness is promoted as well as that of others. Liberalism does not treat men and women as children, begging them to be good for the sake of a reward hereafter, but says, You must deal justly, honestly, virtuously, because to do otherwise injures humanity, and every individual in the world has the same rights as yourself. Liberalism rejects vicarious atonement, affirming that upon each must fall the burden and punishment of his or her violation of natural law or infringement of another's rights.

Liberalism is a positiv, affirmativ force in all questions pertaining to human welfare. It affirms that instead of a God, natural law, operating eternally, is the power moving the universe. For creation, Liberalism affirms evolution, and by the laws of evolution design in nature givs place to natural selection. The notion that man is totally depraved is replaced by the affirmation that the good in human nature overbalances the evil, and that ancestral experiences, organized in the race as inherited tendencies, are what predispose men to evil instead of the theological "original sin." But Liberalism further affirms that these tendencies are more and more becoming good, and will result in future generations in producing men and women with as greatly superior characters as the people of to-day possess over our forefathers who burned heretics for the love they bore their God. As Henry Ward Beecher said, man, instead of being a fallen creature, began at zero and has been rising ever since. Liberalism affirms that this progress must inevitably go on. As to salvation through Christ, Liberalism affirms that it has not yet been proved that there is any hell to be saved from, and maintains that what man most needs to be saved from is ignorance, poverty, and the priests.

In what we hav written we hav not attempted to formulate a creed, but Mr. Benoit can gather from it some of the distinctivly affirmativ principles of Liberalism, as well as a good idea of what it seeks to destroy. We may also add that Liberalism has a political side, the principles of which can be found in the Nine Demands forming the platform of the American Secular Union.

New Jersey Freethinkers Must Be Careful.

In Newark, New Jersey, there is a vigorous Liberal League, which in the winter meets regularly every Sunday afternoon. All kinds of speakers occupy the platform, and expound all sorts of ideas. The majority of the speakers are Freethinkers, and they not unfrequently talk heresy. We wish to warn the League of the evil consequences of this kind of oratory. By the law of New Jersey, giving expression to the following sentiments is punishable by twelve months' imprisonment at hard labor:

1. Denying the being of God.
2. Denying the providence of God.
3. Cursing or contumeliously (rudely or scornfully) reproaching the being of God.
4. Cursing or contumeliously reproaching the providence of God.
5. Cursing or contumeliously reproaching Jesus Christ.
6. Cursing or contumeliously reproaching the Holy Ghost (whatever that is).
7. Cursing or contumeliously reproaching the Christian religion.
8. Cursing or contumeliously reproaching the Bible (Protestant edition).
8. Profane scoffing at any of the foregoing (alleged) persons, things, and canonical books.
9. Exposing any of the foregoing (alleged) persons, things, or canonical books to ridicule.
10. Exposing any of the foregoing (alleged) persons, things, or canonical books to contempt.

We hav heard speakers and members of the Newark League say all these forbidden things and the hall did not crumble nor the officers of the law interfere. But we advise the Newarkers to be careful in future. New Jersey is jealous of her God, and will defend him with the last drop of blood a heretic has in his body.

The Trial of Anarchy in Chicago.

The case against the eight so-called Anarchists of Chicago who hav been on trial for the past few weeks was given to the jury on Thursday afternoon, the 19th inst., and on Friday morning, the 20th, the jury returned the following verdict:

"We, the jury, find the defendants, August Spies, Michael Schwab, Samuel Fielden, Albert R. Parsons, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, and Louis Lingg, guilty of murder as charged in the indictment, and fix the penalty at death. We find the defendant, Oscar W. Neebe, guilty of murder in manner and form as charged in the indictment, and fix the penalty at imprisonment in the penitentiary for fifteen years."

On another page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER Mr. E. A. Stevens tells how the trial has been conducted, and upon what perjured testimony the state has been compelled to rely. Mr. Stevens's statements agree with our own careful reading of the history of this trial. It has been a trial reflecting no credit upon either the police or state's attorneys of Chicago, and the verdict is the result of popular prejudice against the Anarchists. It is a monstrous verdict, and unless reversed by the supreme court of Illinois will end in judicial murder.

Aside from the injustice done the men themselvs, this trial in deplorable in its results. The verdict angers the thousands of Socialists in Chicago, while feeding the wrath of the general public against them. Unless cool counsels prevail there will be bloodshed in Chicago. The comments of the press are of a nature calculated to make every sympathizer with the condemned men furious with rage, and the threats of the Anarchists arouse the passions of the police. What the Anarchists would like to do is hinted at in these words of Attorney Foster:

"If the day ever comes that the ropes are placed about the necks of those prisoners, the members of the jury will not be out of danger. I hav urged the prisoners to hav all their friends exercise their influence against violence between now and the end of the case."

The feeling entertained by the police, voiced by the press, and more or less shared by the general public, is shown by the retort to Mr. Foster of Police Inspector Bonfield:

"I want to say that if any violence is done by the friends of these men, the lamp-posts of Chicago will bear fruit. In my opinion the police will be powerless to quell the popular rage, and public vengeance will be summarily wreaked upon all the friends and pronounced sympathizers of Anarchy."

The senseless tyranny which the authorities feel empowered by this verdict to exercise will make matters still worse. A list of nearly three hundred men and women, known to be Socialists, is in the possession of the police, and it is reported that wholesale arrests will surely follow. Among those mentioned as liable to be arrested are Mrs. Parsons and Mrs. Holmes, née Swank. When war is made upon women who hav done absolutely nothing, the authorities are playing the part of either desperate tyrants or desperate fools.

These Anarchists were indicted for murder, and if murder had been proved upon them, then should punishment follow. But it has not. They hav been convicted of being social revolutionists, and as that is not a crime, they are punished for something else. The Sun of this city—a journal that usually keeps its head—reveals the prejudice which has brought the verdict of guilty in an editorial of last Saturday. "Seven murderous and frantic scoundrels," it says, "men envenomed against all law, all reason, all decency, and the peace and welfare of a civilized people, are to be extirpated on the gallows for the murders of which they are guilty." The Sun should think just a little, and the first thought should be of the plain fact that the state has not convicted these men of killing Mathias J. Deegan, for which they were indicted. The second thought may well be whether to be envenomed against law is a capital crime, whether to be envenomed against reason is worthy of death, and whether even an indecent man should be summarily hanged. The condemned victims of popular clamor hav talked foolishly, wildly; but the charge that they killed or conspired to kill Mathias J. Deegan has not been sustained by a particle of legal evidence. It has been a "trial" of principles, and not of men for murder. The long and short of the whole matter is, these men are to be hanged because they are Anarchists—a lot more of people are to be arrested because they sympathize with them—and the whole proceeding will be termed a "warning to a class of exotic criminals for whom there is no room in this land." We hav no sympathy with the wild gasconade and threats of those Anarchistic orators. They are the blind leading the blind. But we hav an abiding faith in freedom, a warm regard for fair play, and a jealous love for American institutions. The trial has outraged every distinctivly American principle, and this conviction, if sustained, and the men executed, will be as black a blot upon the fame of the republic as are the years of negro slavery. Our government cannot afford to be unjust to the humblest citizen, nor to the most depraved criminal.

Parochial Schools.

A few days since we saw an item in a religious paper announcing that the Catholics are building parochial schools in nearly every parish in the country. This is in obedience to the decree of the last Catholic council.

We are glad to note, however, that there is some opposition to these schools, and, as in the present instance, in places most unexpected. In New Haven, Conn., in St. John's parish, there is a parochial school established. A Mr. Maloney is the priest of the parish. Sunday, the 7th inst., he preached a sermon which reveals a rebellion against his authority.

He said that during the past week or two he had been visiting the parishioners inquiring why it was that the parochial school was not better attended by the children of the parish. In one instance he called upon a woman who told him that she would not do as he wished; that the people had been priest-ridden long enough, and that she would giv her children a public school education if they never saw the inside of a church or a Sunday-school. "Look at me," she said. "How many salt tears hav I shed because I hav not had an education?"

Mr. Maloney told his congregation that he hoped "God would pity this woman, but he never felt more like putting the curse of God on anyone in his life. Why, in the city of Hartford," he went on, "the city of the bishop, no Catholics are allowed to receive absolution or communion who do not send their children to the parochial schools. I am going to the synod next Tuesday, as all the priests are, and if they feel as I do on this subject there will not be anyone in this parish who will get absolution or be permitted to come to the altar rail if they send their children to the public schools."

Think of the arrogance of this man and his class! He would put the "curse of God" on this woman because she desired that her child should be educated. Who gave the "curse of God" into Mr. Maloney's keeping for him to punish his enemies with? His threat to boycott all who do not send their children to his parochial school may affect some of the more superstitious of his parishioners, but many of his congregation feel indignant at his assumption of power, and if he executes his threat the revolt, the reports say, will include more than the abused woman. This parochial school question is assuming proportions of importance. There can be no question of the church's right to build them, but there is a question of whether the church has the right to force people to send their children to them. Parents should hav free choice in this matter, and, although the church's thunders are only theatrical to men and women of sense, yet to the dupes who hav been educated that way, they are real. The question is, Has a foreign power like Rome a legal right to terrorize an American citizen into doing that which he believes is unwholesome?

There should be some way by which Roman Catholic parents can be protected in sending their children to the public schools when they find that the parochial schools are utterly valueless as educators. Priests should not be allowed to be bulldozers, although their victims may richly deserve their punishment for believing in the "curse of God," and a priest who "puts the curse on" whenever he likes.

The State Convention.

The time appointed for the annual reunion of Freethinkers is close at hand, and preparations for attending the Convention at White Sulphur Springs are being made by a good many folks that we know of. We hope, also, that many hundreds that we don't know of are getting ready. These annual gatherings are very pleasant, as those who hav been there can testify, and the time and money consumed are solid investments. This Convention is a little different from previous meetings, as more opportunity is offered for social courtesies, and less stress is laid upon oratory. But the latter promises to be not less interesting than usual, for we can announce the presence of Lucy N. Colman, Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, Susan H. Wixon, Helen H. Gardener, L. K. Washburn, John Peck, W. S. Bell, C. B. Reynolds, J. J. McCabe, T. L. Brown, J. L. Andrew, and, probably, Charles Watts and T. B. Wakeman. Other speakers, too, may find it convenient to attend, and all will be heartily welcome and afforded an opportunity to express their views.

The catalog of amusements at the Springs is given in the advertisment on the last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and is quite attractiv. Young folks especially—the boys and girls—will enjoy the fun to be had from fishing, boating, and dancing, and if they occasionally run away from the preaching, no offense will be taken. A cordial invitation to be present is extended to all young heretics, and the older ones should come along to look after them.

One measure that we should like this Convention to devise practical steps to advance is the repealing by the New York legislature of the law exempting church property from taxation. This is the most appropriate work of the New York Freethinkers, and should be vigorously pushed. If Freethinkers from all parts of the state attend the Convention—as it is their duty to do, if they can—a conference upon the subject can be had, and a committee, when personally acquainted, can always work to greater advantage than if strangers to each other. A good start was made last winter, and the fight should be persistently maintained.

Finally, everybody ought to come to the Convention for the good it will do themselvs and the cause. A small convention has no influence upon the public, while a large convention has immense influence.

Catholic Persecution of Protestants.

Those provinces of Russia lying nearest the Baltic sea are mainly peopled by Germans, or by those of German descent. Naturally, what religion they hav is of Lutheran tendency. Of their opinions they are tenacious, and, like their ancestors, will fight to maintain them. These people speak the German language, and Germany is dearer to them than Russia.

The government of Russia, partly for political and partly for religious reasons, has begun a persecution of these people. The political reason is that should Russia ever hav occasion to engage Germany in war, these provinces would be much more likely to help Bismarck than the czar. The religious reason is—religion. The czar's government is therefore endeavoring to force them into the Greek church, and thus obliterate German sentiment along the Baltic. All the children of mixed marriages are claimed by the authorities for the Greek church. One pastor has been sentenced to the mines for rebelling, and sixty others hav been summoned before the authorities for maintaining the religious rights of their people.

There is nothing odd about this sort of thing. It is so common as to hardly excite comment, except in Infidel papers. The odd thing would be for two Christian sects to dwell together in peace, and the uncommon thing would be for the czar's government to manifest any toleration toward anybody.

Editorial Notes.

JOHN P. GUILD, in writing of Mr. Reynolds's arrest, asks, in the Investigator:

"Was it not Christians crazed by whisky that tried to drown the voice of reason in Boonton?"

No, it was not. The Christians were crazed by Christianity.

So far as we hav observed, no religious journal has said a word about the arrest of Mr. Reynolds in Boonton for blasphemy. We hav only a faint hope, however, that their silence springs from shame. More than likely, it proceeds from fear that some of their readers would expect them to condemn the arrest, and that they are unwilling to do.

MERRICK, Seaford, and Hempstead are villages within hailing distance of each other on Long Island, Hempstead being the center where men do congregate when there is anything going on. Messrs. Mollineaux, Jackson, and De Mott are Freethinkers residing in these towns, and each subscribes for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Last fall they all attended the state Convention, solitary and alone. Each thought he was the only Freethinker within miles of his village, and felt intellectually isolated. After the Convention, Mr. De Mott thought an organization would be beneficial, and he advertised for others of his opinion. This resulted in bringing the three gentlemen together, and to-day they hav a Union, which is growing into a solid society, with a library and reading-room. We mention this to show the benefits of organization, and to urge Liberals in other places to take steps to make themselvs acquainted with their Freethinking neighbors. Incidentally, we may remark that the Convention at White Sulphur Springs will afford an excellent opportunity to find out who is a heretic.

THE following is the alleged experience of a Christian who read Sunday newspapers. He writes it to a religious paper:

"As a matter of personal duty, this question was decided by me a few months since, when, after reading the New York papers on Sunday morning, I discovered the effect it was having on my Christian life. An inclination to substitute the newspaper for all other kinds of Sabbath reading was one of these effects. Another was that much of the time just previous to church service was devoted to interesting columns of secular news, and with the result that the mind, at its close, was not open and receptiv to the word of God; during church service it was the news of the day battling with the sermon, the prayers, and the hymns all the way through. This has been my own experience, and I know it to be the experience of many other Christians. What, then, ought we to do? In my own case it was plain; I ordered my Sunday newspaper discontinued."

If Sunday newspapers are evangels of Infidelity, it is a good thing their publishers are just now pushing their circulation with great energy.

THERE are those in this free republic who advocate the suppression and extinction of Socialists and Anarchists because these latter doctrinaires are the sworn enemies of our present form of government, or the state, as it is popularly called. To the attention of such might be presented the following declaration:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructiv of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it; . . . . and for the support of this declaration . . . we mutually pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

Many may not recognize it, but the foregoing is from the Declaration of Independence of the United States. It is dated July 4, 1776, and signed by numerous distinguished patriots, among whom are John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and Thomas Jefferson. It was supported by force and arms. If it were dated July 4, 1886, what would we call those who should sign and support it?

A CORRESPONDENT of a Methodist paper, writing from Berlin, finds Protestant religion to be badly demoralized. Out of nearly a million and a half of population, Berlin has about 900,000 evangelicals, with only 70 churches, and "these hav a seating capacity for only 40,000 persons, so that if all the churches are full at the morning service there are still 860,000 persons deprived of that privilege; and if they are all filled again at night by those who did not attend in the morning, there are every Sabbath in Berlin 820,000 people of the evangelical faith who did not attend divine worship that day. Why, there are not enough churches in Berlin to accommodate even the servants, for the number of these in the city is nearly 70,000 (65,981). In the suburbs, meaning surrounding towns, there are 700,000 evangelicals, but only 20 churches and 30 pastors. In the parish in which I am living, which is about a half-hour's walk from the heart of the city, there are nearly 30,000 souls, 1 church, and 3 ministers. Similar figures might be given of other cities. The parish of Schonfeld (Leipzig) has 40,000 souls, 1 church, and 3 ministers; the parish of Reudniss, 17,000 souls and 1 preacher. But this is not all. Would that it were! Not only is it impossible for the people to attend church, it is impossible for the pastors to giv spiritual attention to the people. If we take 21 from the 120 ministers in Berlin—the 21 being workers in various institutes—we hav only one pastor for each 9,000 souls." Notwithstanding this lack of religion, "the people hav respect for law, and are industrious, and home-loving, and serious." But the correspondent, who is a minister, is morbidly anxious that the people shall get religion, and inveighs almost fiercely against the Sabbath-breaking habits of the Germans. "Religion," he says, "has no greater enemy than the Sabbath-breaker. Destroy the sense of sanctity in the heart of a people for the Sabbath, and the religion of that people is a mere parody. Better a hundred Darwinites in a community than ten Sabbath-breakers." What puzzles us is, if the people are so good without religion, why should the church desire a change? Goodness is what the ministers profess to want.

Letters from Friends.

ITHACA, N. Y., Aug. 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed postal note for $1, to help support the New York State Liberal Convention. I cannot be there myself, but send this for the good of the cause I understand it to represent. Your illustrations are grand, to those who understand their application.

ZENAS KENT.

GREELEY, COL., Aug. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: On the 1st and 2d of August we had the pleasure of listening to two of those able and eloquent lectures—"Universal Liberty," and "The New Heaven and Earth"—by our fearless and brave lecturer of the American Secular Union, S. P. Putnam. I would counsel friends of our cause all over the country to secure the services of S. P. Putnam, if possible, for he is a fine speaker. He does not word his lectures in a way to giv offense to those who may differ with him, but he drives the truth home every time. Our Liberal people were delighted with him, and his mode of dealing with the question under discussion. He is fearless and outspoken in his denunciations of priestcraft and its superstitions, and well he might be, for he advocates the cause of humanity, of reform, and of human progress. I reccived a letter from him to-day, stating that he would be with us again on August 17th and 18th. So we will hav another intellectual treat.

I am sorry Brother Reynolds has been so badly treated in New Jersey. Why don't all you good people come to the glorious West, where a man can think for himself, and speak his honest convictions, without hindrance? The old states of the East are too conservativ, with a few exceptions, while the great West is growing rapidly in population, wealth, and, best of all, Liberal ideas.

I second the motion of M. L. Sanders in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 7th in regard to publishing tracts for general distribution, and at an early day I will forward my mite toward paying expenses for publishing the same; and if you want a Liberal in this part of our country to distribute them, just send as many to me as you wish, and I will see to it that they are well distributed. J. W. LEIGHTON.

WANSHIP, UTAH, Aug. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please hand inclosed $2.50 to Mr. Reynolds, to help repair "our" tent. Those Boonton, N. J., Christians ought to be sent to the orthodox heaven for six months. Maybe they deserve a year, but twanging a harp and shouting glory to the lamb for a full year would be a fearful punishment. Truly the followers of the lowly one hav queer ways of "doing unto others as ye would they should do unto you." I hope our friends will promptly send Mr. Reynolds funds to repair the tent and stand the law-suit with the Boonton cut-throats. Fraternally yours, WM. REYNOLDS.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Aug. 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office money order for $12—$10 to pay subscription to Campaign Fund for the year past, $1 to help repair the tent, and $1 for the annual meeting of New York state Freethinkers at White Sulphur Springs. Am a little late with my subscription, but suppose it is better late than never. JOSEPH YORK.

Aug. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please send my paper to Dayville, Conn. I am leaving this place in a few days—there are too many Christian cranks here to suit me. The man that owns the church here failed, and never paid for the lumber, nor yet did he pay the men for building it; but he is a Christian, and loves the Lord, so I suppose it is all right. He will enter in by the straight gate, and receive a harp and a pair of wings. Amen! MRS. MARTHA HART.

MASTERTON, WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND,
July 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I notice a great difference of opinion with regard to the cartoons. It seems to me those who still hav a corner of superstition left don't like them. I fancy if the cartoons were on the last page, it would suit all parties—those who do not like them can take off the last page, and giv it away. Another reason is, some are worth framing, or pasting up in a room or in a scrap-book. I wished to do so, but did not like to destroy the first page, and the reading matter on the second. I vote for them on the last page, or next to it, so I can be able to make an album.

N. STENHOUSE.

WAVERLEY, NEB., Aug. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps a few words in regard to Mr. Remsburg's lectures delivered here July 22d and 23d may not prove uninteresting to your many readers. Mr. Remsburg is an earnest, able, and eloquent speaker, showing a thorough knowledge of his subjects, and bringing to bear upon them an array of evidence that is incontrovertible. To the Liberals his lectures were as a cool fountain of water to the thirsty traveler, so seldom hav we the opportunity of listening to discourses illuminated by the torch of reason, and not the product of the imagination alone.

Our Christian friends were not so well pleased. Some professed themselvs thoroughly disgusted, while others were strongly impressed with the idea (inspired, I suppose) that he should be shipped instanter in a box-car. The clergy were conspicuous by their absence. Nevertheless, the following Sunday the Methodist minister attempted to answer, in a roundabout way, what he hadn't heard. He informed his hearers that Washington was a Christian, evidence or no evidence to the contrary; also "that there had never been any real good accomplished in the world by anyone not a Christian," and much more in the same vein.

Although the Liberals are but a handful in numbers compared with the enemy, we are going to make an effort to secure the services of Mr. S. P. Putnam for one or two lectures on his return trip through Nebraska, that we may hav the double satisfaction of hearing the truth ourselvs and of having a parting shot fired into the Christian camp that will keep them in commotion the balance of this year of grace 1886. Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER and to the cause of Freethought the world over. S. J. C.

HUDSON, WIS., Aug. 8, E.M., 286.

MR. EDITOR: The illustration on the front page of your last week's issue, called, "The Sabbatarian Scarecrow," is an excellent one, and I will take great pains to show it to as many of my Christian friends as possible. It reminds me of a notice which appeared about two weeks ago in one of our local papers, and which I feel inclined to relate, not as anything uncommon—oh, no!—but just to show that the town of Hudson is not behind, as far as bigotry and superstition are concerned. Here is the "scarecrow:"

A PUBLIC PROTEST.

We, the undersigned ministers of the gospel and citizens of Hudson, in the name of religion, and in the interests of good citizenship, the morals of our community—especially of our youth—feel constrained to enter our immediate and earnest protest against the further violation of the Sabbath, in the excursion advertised to leave Stillwater next Sabbath, August 1st, stopping at this place, as well as similar desecrations of the Lord's day.

Signed by five ministers, and more than forty of the most prominent citizens.

The above-named excursion took place on the announced date, but, in consequence of the "protest," only a few persons—mostly laborers and the "lower class" of people—dared go to the landing when the boat arrived, for fear of losing their names as moral persons and good citizens. A few days later the church parties arranged an excursion, to take place on a week-day, and kindly fixed the fare so as to make it impossible for any poor person to participate, even if he would spend a day's wages and risk the loss of his situation. So you see, again, this time there was no danger of the "prominent" getting into disreputable company. Now, I would like to ask the "ministers of the gospel," and all, if it is any more demoralizing to seek amusements and recreations on Sunday than on any other day. I know that a trip on the lake or river, with splendid sceneries in view, listening to good music, is refreshing to both soul and body, and cannot be demoralizing. Those who hav immoral tendencies will find occasion to develop them, even if "guarded" by the church; but of course the day that is too "sacred" for the celebration of our Independence Day is too sacred for anything.

Not wishing to take too much space, I will close with best wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER and all truth seekers.

CHARLES HANSON.

OMAHA, Aug. 14, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Your getting-better-every-day paper, the glorious TRUTH SEEKER, had a small article in it to-day about escaped nuns. Well, I am not going to write about escaped nuns, but I am going to tell you something about an escaped Catholic, in the person of a young girl of nineteen summers. Her parents, being good Catholics, ill-used her so much that she left home, and for protection came to board with Mrs. Archibald. She was then working for the Elgin National Watch Company, but, she not being of age then, her father and mother met her one day at the gate of the watch factory with a covered carriage, and in a moment hustled her in and drove her to the priest, who ordered her, under penalty of dissolution from the church, to go back at once with her folks; and she, not being of age, had to go, and she remained at home as long as she could stand the hard usage of her parents, who would beat, kick, or strike her with whatever came to their hands; and, at the toe of her father's boot, she ran from the house, and again came to our house for protection. She then being of age, the priest and whole fraternity of Catholic sisters combined to get her into their clutches again, but hav so far failed. They hav tried to persecute her in every way possible, but I am glad to know that she denounces the faith in toto, and I think she will never again confess to a priest. She gave me a recital of a confession, which I will write for the benefit of your readers, if you think this letter worth publishing:

GOING TO CONFESSION.

First: "Say the prayer:"

"Father, forgive me, for I am a sinner."

Second: "Say the Confetior:"

"I confess to the mighty God, blessed Michael the archangel, blessed St. John the Baptist, the holy apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, and to all the saints in heaven, to pray to the Lord thy God for me; through my fault, through my fault (here strike your breast)."

Now comes confession to the priest; tell him all the sins you hav committed.

If a girl, tell if you hav a fellow, and how late you stay with him nights, and all about how you act, etc.

Now say the act of contrition:

"O my God, I am heartily sorry for having offended thee!

"I detest my sins most sincerely.

"Not only by them hav I lost all right to heaven, but deserve everlasting punishment of hell. I am heartily sorry for offending thee, and I will do all I can to atone for my sins, and amend my life. Amen."

Then the priest tells you whether you can go to holy communion, or not.

It depends on how many lies they tell the priest. If they hav lied good to him, and made themselvs out pretty good, why, they can go to holy communion; but if they hav been honest, and told him the truth, and showed that they were not much better than he, they would hav to do without that holy rite, and would hav to get on their marrow-bones, and count a lot of beads to do penance, and atone to this great, big, almighty God for their sins.

Cartoons! yes, yes, let us hav them. I would send some money for their benefit, if I could; but I think I can soon. And Reynolds! I wish I had the means to help him fight those big-heads. I hope he will teach them a lesson that will prevent them, in future, disturbing honest people who are minding their own business. We are expecting a treat from Putnam in September. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER, is the prayer of I. W. ARCHIBALD.

DENVER, COL., Aug. 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of our beautiful city are all greatly pleased over the grand lecture delivered last night by S. P. Putnam, in the Taber Grand Opera House. The house was filled, and judging by the frequent applause that followed some of his most telling blows against orthodoxy, the lecture was appreciated. The Liberals were very proud of both the lecture and the speaker.

As a general thing, I believe the people here are a broad, liberal-minded people, and accord to all the privilege of following the dictates of their own consciences; and especially so in the observance of Sunday. It is really a day of recreation and rest here, and the railroads can hardly accommodate the crowds of people who flock to the mountain resorts on that day.

There seems to be an inspiration in the grand old Rocky Mountains, and in the perpetual sunshine of Colorado, and one's ideas and nature broaden in unison with the immensity of the country by which we are surrounded. Living here in the shadow of the huge mountains, life takes on a grander meaning, and the old superstitions and narrow-minded views with which many persons come here seem to die out, and they emerge, free and untrammeled, into the beautiful sunlight of Freethought.

I believe the lecture last night caused an unusual demand for the dear old TRUTH SEEKER, for I went after mine this afternoon, and they were all sold, but I won't miss reading it, for I can borrow it of my friends.

I hope, on the return of Mr. Putnam next Sunday night, that he will find, if possible, a larger audience than before. I wish we could hav just such an entertaining, good lecture every Sunday night. MISS M. I. PATTERSON.

NEWARK, N. J., Aug. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Intelligence is the greatest wealth the god of nature can bestow, but it is lightly esteemed in America if the man lacks the almighty dollar. Man is taught to listen to the voice of truth; reason should overcome passion or prejudice, and justice be over all. Avarice is a curse to man; it is the father of all crime. We read in holy writ that it is hard for rich men to get to heaven; they hav barely a single chance, while the poor hav many. But those rich Christians are willing to take their God, the almighty dollar, and take the half-chance to get to heaven, thereby proving they don't believe what they preach. Brothers Talmage and Beecher go for their dollars, and take their annual vacations during dogdays, and come home and draw their pay; but the poor man has no vacation only when he dies—and then, if he is a Catholic, he can't go to heaven till he pays for a certain number of prayers for the repose of his soul; no prayers, no heaven. So wealth is power. It is a great crime to be poor in this land of the free and the home of the aristocrat, where political thieves deal and dispense justice—if you are able to pay. No money, no justice or liberty. The politicians, aristocrats, and priests are the rulers of this great country, and if an intelligent man dares raise his voice against those frauds, he is quickly hurried before a political judge, and arraigned as a criminal and thrust into prison, where they tell him he ought to be hung. And if you refuse to shut your eyes and open wide your mouth, and swallow the blood, body, and soul of their God, they say you ought to be fried in a pan, as they did the Protestants long ago. They will even dictate to the judge and tell him that the greater the intelligence the greater should be the punishment.

Might makes right; that is all the justice or liberty we can get until we emancipate ourselvs from politicians.

W. W. MORRIS.

NEWPORT, ME., Aug. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The question before the people is not, "The Joys of Heaven," or "Could Jesus Christ Write?" No one who has something to liv for, a purpose in life, cares anything about "The Joys of Heaven" or whether "Jesus Christ Could Write" or not. But the question before the people is, Has the producer the right to the full loaf he has produced, or shall some non-producing thief get one-half without labor? That is the question, gentlemen, and if you don't know it, I am here to inform you.

If it was a crime for Nero to fiddle while Rome was burning, it is a far greater crime to ignore the question of all questions, that of the rights of the producer. With the iron hand of despotism on the throat of the workers, it is a crime to be silent.

The government under which we liv stands with its murderous feet on the prostrate forms of every wealth-producer in the land, and where are the voices and pens of most of the Freethinkers? Fiddling about something that is not worth the paper it is written on.

What is the condition of the people in the cities, especially in Chicago? Is there not a reign of terror there? Where is our boasted free speech? It is mere mockery to talk about it—it is gone.

Pilate and Herod—church and state—joined hands to keep the black man in slavery. Now they are doing the same thing to keep the wealth-producers in a worse condition than was that of the chattel slave. Priest and politician are both sold to the devil of selfishness, all to outrageously rob the people and make them slaves.

If a hundred years hav proved that neither church nor state can help us, then to whom shall we look for help if not to the Freethinkers? The press, above all things else, is the grand educator, or the terrible demoralizer. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the one above all others to ring out its clear, clarion tones against despotism. The piratical craft, Church and State, is bearing down on us—let us clear the decks for action.

Since writing the above I hav read J. Wm. Lloyd's grand words. They hav the right ring, and with every pulsation of my heart I say, Here is my hand, and I giv you a brother's blessing. What are those men in prison for? They are there because they hav seen fit to denounce a government that protects men who are a million times greater criminals than common robbers. If governments had not oppressed the people for thousands of years, such men as Parsons, Spies, and Fielden would never hav been born. And the talk of L. Tenney is the kind we heard before the war: "Hang Wendell Phillips, and there will be no more trouble." Hanging and imprisoning people cures nothing. Why, the prisons from Liberia's cold regions to Thomastown, Me., are all full now. Justice to the wealth-producers will prevent all this, but punishment, never.

Friends, don't think for a moment that it is blind chance that is at work in this mighty revolution. These men that are in prison may be hard, rough men, but there is intelligence behind all this, and they are the chosen instruments; and their imprisonment or punishment will as certainly hasten the doom of this government as the law of compensation is sure. To demand the punishment of these men is to side with the oppressor, which is precisely what was done with John Brown and others. But did that cure the terrible crime of slavery? Does not history repeat itself? Did not the bloody conflict between the North and the South come in consequence of the crime of oppression of the black man? Will the cry for the blood of these men cure anything? It is folly to think so. The foundation-stones in your stores and palatial mansions are cemented with blood, and they may hav to be washed out with the blood of their occupants. We shall see. SEWARD MITCHELL.

EUREKA, July 29, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to put in my protest against certain principles that are advocated in articles that hav made their appearance in THE TRUTH SEEKER of late. It seems to me that none but a crank would advocate such ideas—but perhaps I am a crank, too. I hold that all hav an equal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, etc., but not to what there is of property in the world belonging to other people—a right to what they hav the ability and good luck to acquire.

Suppose I go into the peanut business, and as business improves I hire a boy or man to help sell; after a little he strikes for higher wages or fewer hours of work. I tell him I don't want him any more at any price, and he and his friends combine and boycott me, and mob anyone that I employ in place of the striker. I consider it is an outrageous proceeding. Because I employed the boy once, must I always do it? He has no more claim on me than if I had never employed him, and it makes no difference if I hav a capital of $5,000,000 or $5—and the strikes almost always are on when the times are the worst, and when the laborers' work is of the least good to the capitalist.

I think it is a credit to anyone to hav property to be protected by law; and that it goes to show that he is an honorable man, too, for honesty is policy; if he is improvident, he can't be honest or honorable long, but will borrow till borrowing is played out, and then he will take to something worse. When all are thrifty, hope and happiness prevail. Wealth has an elevating and refining effect, all other things being equal.

Labor societies are a monstrous tyranny, not only on the public, but on their own members. A large part of them are forced into it by a few leaders and roughs. The industrious, hard-working, decent ones pay the bills, and if they kick or leave the organization, they are scabs, and there is no chance or peace for them afterwards. I wish that the laws could be enforced, and that governors, mayors, etc., were more ready to put down riots; but they are afraid they might lose some of the rabble's votes. Take notice, Republicans, James G. Blaine belongs to the Knights of Labor. I wonder what that is for? Would he not join the Anarchists so long as he could ride into the presidency thereby? I think that he will miss it, and all will that humor such principles. I believe that right and square dealing is the best even in politics.

I think the so-called labor organizations hav been a failure to benefit the members or outsiders with time and money wasted in the last twenty or thirty years. But they divide humanity into classes, and separate them more and more distinctly, which should not be in this land of equality. Instead of depending on himself and building up his own fortunes and the family's, the workingman is looking for some big thing to be done by the society. They talk as if they represented the labor interests of the country, and those who differ or oppose them are the enemies of the poor laboring man. They do not represent the labor of the country, but only a dangerous element of it. A large part of the men of capital that the Knights hav such a grudge against work harder, and nearly a third more hours out of the twenty-four, than they. The corner that capital makes on grain does not so much hurt as the corner on labor. Suppose that the farmers and stockmen (if it were possible) should combine and make a corner on eatables, what a howl we would hear from the labor reformers about the oppression of the laborer! And yet the farmer is the one that works long and hard!

For what did those policemen and citizen soldiers carry arms, if they were not to be used to enforce the authority of the laws, and protect life and property? But then, you say, there were some innocent people killed or wounded. Yes, but all know that in bad company is a dangerous place, and no place for a good citizen. How wicked the soldiers were to disturb the rioters! And Milwaukee would not stand more than an hour's stoning and abuse, nor wait till the rabble could tear down the factory! Too bad!

An article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 19th from the New York Evening Post is about the size of the Anarchist idea. For the attempts at murder singly and wholesale, whether of king, citizen, or subject, and destruction of property, either in this country or any other, the perpetrators should be treated like the raiding Apaches—all should join to exterminate them.

The man that will not do anything for himself and family will not do well either in a public or private capacity for anyone else, as a rule.

I think we hav a glorious country, and, with all its faults, the best the world has ever seen. We must try to perfect it and make it better as time goes on, and so in time help all humanity to something better. When we can establish strictly Secular schools throughout the land, where a practical education will be taught, including industrial training for both sexes, and compulsory attendance enforced, then poverty will be less and less, and then we can begin to talk of the good time coming. I believe that doing right as policy should be taught, and the idea that because a man has wealth he got it by rascality from some one else should be exploded. That is the doctrin that Christianity teaches directly or indirectly. The dishonest man when he does get rich acquires it in spite of the dishonesty, and on account of good business ability, etc.

And now, Mr. Editor, and proprietors of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will conclude by wishing that you may make at least fifteen or twenty per cent on THE TRUTH SEEKER investment, and build up an establishment equal to the New York Herald in magnitude, and become capitalists; and the cause of Freethought will grow and prosper with you throughout the land, because when Liberals become rich and fashionable then all the world will follow the fashion, and we will hav no moral-coward Liberals that dare not say their soul is their own, but all will be brave.

Your heads are level about the pictures—they are a great thing for the cause of Freethought. FLORIDA CRACKER.

BELDING, MICH., July 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Close, our tried and true Liberal friend, has written the inclosed letter to the Belding Secular Society, and given us permission to hav it published in THE TRUTH SEEKER if we thought best. If your space will permit, you can print and oblige Yours, etc., LUELLA K. WEBSTER.

TO THE LIBERAL SOCIETY AT BELDING, MICHIGAN.

For more than forty years I hav given much earnest, and, I trust, honest thought to matters pertaining to religious beliefs, and particularly to the orthodox Christian creeds and teachings prevalent in our land.

And during the past fifteen years, having been a confirmed invalid, I hav had more opportunity and cause to giv my attention to religious subjects than would hav been the case if my health had permitted me to take an activ part in the business affairs of life.

My health has been such that I hav been merely "lingering on the shores of time," as our Christian friends sometimes say. Christian friends hav often called my attention to the necessity of being prepared for the change that awaits us all, and as I could not possibly be the gainer by doing otherwise, I hav endeavored to determin whether theirs is the true and better way.

The more I hav thought, read, and reasoned, the farther I hav drifted from an acceptance of a belief in either of the many orthodox Christian creeds; and chiefly because the doctrin of eternal future punishment for belief, or unbelief, appears so unjust and monstrous that it is impossible to believe it true.

And without such belief the Bible and the whole orthodox Christian structure fails and falls, according to my understanding of them.

As to whether there is or is not a conscious state of existence after death, I think we cannot positivly know, but it is well to cultivate a hope that there may be, because to most people the idea is enjoyable, and may be productiv of good if we also believe and giv paramount importance to the just and consistent theory that we shall start in future life as much better as good words and deeds done here entitle us to become.

This should be, and is, to all who are not blinded by the teachings of priestcraft, a better and greater stimulus to a good life here than the established doctrin of Christianity which teaches that sin or wrong will be pardoned by asking God, through prayer, or by the priest at the confessional.

In order to show the fallacy of such teaching, let us apply the principle to the punishment for crime in our enlightened land. To illustrate, take the murder of President Garfield as an instance. Apply this rule of pardon for the asking: The assassin only need petition the court earnestly in a penitent manner for pardon and it should hav been granted. The judge would, in obedience to this law of forgivness, hav been in duty bound to order the clerk to enter upon the records the application for pardon, and also that the culprit be set free; and if he were so disposed he might repeat the same or any crime he chose as often as he pleased, and go scot-free according to God's law and his justice.

How preposterous and void of all force, as a preventativ of crime, such a law would appear to all intelligent people, in this, our so-called Christian land! It would hardly be thought worthy of consideration for a moment. But this would only be in perfect accord with the teachings of our much-lauded Christian theology, and God's justice as taught in the Bible. And this is probably the principal reason why the records of crime show that about ninety-nine of every one hundred of the criminals in our land are either members of some Christian church or profess a belief in the truth of the Christian religion.

It cannot be successfully denied that a rule of law, both moral and civil (as also the laws of nature), teaching that those who break the laws will surely be punished according to the magnitude of the crime, would be far more efficient in preventing sin, crime, or wrong than this theological law, the invention of priestcraft for the purpose of sustaining and building up church organization and keeping the people subordinate to the priesthood—who hav in all ages endeavored, by all manner of devices, to lead mankind in some blind mysterious way that would enable them (the priests) to liv in ease and comfort—if not opulence—at the expense of those who, in the main, toil for their daily bread, and also to create a surplus of wealth, without which enlightened civilization and improvements in the arts and sciences would be impossible.

It is more than probable that many of the labor troubles that now afflict the world are the result of the great accumulation of church property that escapes taxation, amounting to the vast sum of seventy-two million dollars in the city of New York alone.

In order to more fully illustrate why I could not accept the fundamental doctrins of Christianity as just and true, I will relate some things that are known to me from personal experience.

Some years ago, a family, who had struggled and toiled as those who carve a home from the wilderness with small means hav to do, was beginning to fail in health in consequence. But they (the parents) were cheered by the help of a very dutiful, intelligent son, about sixteen years old, who gave hope of a great help in their declining years. But God, in his wise providence (as Christians told them), saw fit to remove him by death very suddenly. Although the parents never had made any religious profession, out of respect for, and in compliance with, the customs of the community, they employed a Baptist preacher to officiate at the funeral.

The preacher had known the boy intimately for several years, and thought highly of him; indeed, considering their disparity in years, they were more than usually intimate. But, as the young man had not made any religious profession, and had arrived at the age of accountability, what could or should he say in regard to his future state?

His humanity was so much better and larger than his religion and his creed that he did not feel it in his heart to say that the immortal soul of the boy had probably just commenced an eternity of misery. But if Christianity is true, that was the most important point for him to impress upon the minds of his audience. The demand for it is as great as the difference of a few years of life here and an eternal future life of happiness or misery.

And so thought a few of the older members of his church; therefore they took him to task for a neglect of duty. He was reminded that another opportunity might never again occur that would enable him to make so great an impression on the minds of the parents, and convince them of the truths of Christianity.

The matter finally culminated in a difference in the society to that extent that several members were excluded. In about a year another member of the same afflicted family was laid by the side of his brother in the cemetery. This time it was a little child of ten years, who had been an invalid and a terrible sufferer all his life. The same preacher was again called to officiate at the funeral. Thinking perhaps to make some amend for the fault that some charged him with in the other case, he told the parents, in a very impressiv manner, that God had caused this dear little one to suffer as it had done for the purpose of bringing the parents to him, that they might be saved from the tortures that await all who remain unconverted, are not born again, etc.

For the parents this was too much, particularly the mother, who had known, as only a mother could, the intense suffering of her dear little one during all the long, weary days and nights of those ten years. To her the thought would come, "What kind of a God is this you ask me to love and worship that he should cause our innocent child to suffer thus? It is an outrage upon every principle of justice, love, and benevolence, and if he, infinit as you say he is, in foreknowledge, power, etc., could do and has done this thing, he is more of a demon than a God of love and mercy, and you need not ask me to worship him, for I cannot, and would not if I could." And, although not an unbeliever before, she has been ever since, and probably always will be.

And now, Liberal and Freethought friends, in view of these and many other inconsistencies and false teachings that Christianity has promulgated, and which hav a controlling influence in our land, let us endeavor to learn, teach, and practice a better way. There certainly should be a principle and theory better than that which teaches mankind to worship a being as a creator who, with attributes all infinit, has created this world, as well as the whole universe, caused it to be inhabited with millions of intelligent people, and destined them to liv through all the endless ages of eternity in another life "where the smoke of their torment ascendeth for ever and ever"—after having thrust them into this life without their knowledge or consent, after allowing them to liv here a few years of mingled pleasure and pain, consigns them to an eternity of misery. And for what? I cannot conceive any reason, unless it be to gratify a spirit of vindictivness.

This (the Christian doctrin) is certainly too horrible to be true, and therefore should not be taught. Therefore let us work for the removal of this terrible incubus that priestcraft has fastened on the minds and hearts of mankind. Let us all talk, and work, and in every way act in such a way as to promote the happiness of everybody and all things in this life; cultivate and sustain whatever will enhance and cause to grow a spirit of friendship and good-will, in all our business and social relations; let temperance, industry, honesty, and charity, be prominent, and control all our best efforts; let us put aside everything pertaining to belief in some unknown, and, as I think, unknowable, future existence, and work out a salvation for this life that shall help make it happy and enjoyable, hoping and fearing for a hereafter only to that extent that will help us here and now.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Our Friends' Rear-Guards.

We find, while studying our friends,
That some hav hoofs, some nails,
Some dreaded weapons at both ends,
Some character in tails.

Some trail their tails along their tracks;
Some hook them up a wee;
Some curl them high above their backs;
Some hang and swing them free.

Some tails are twisted, some are straight,
While some hav shrinking manners;
Some short, or long, or moderate;
Some held aloft as banners.

Some tails serve but as ornaments;
Some dare attack their foes;
Some, too, hav queer accomplishments;
As India's falcon knows.

Some own but one, and some hav none;
Others hav many tails;
Submariners these, and some are known
To use them coiled for sails.

Some rudders are on aerial ships,
Some paddles in the sea,
Some forked, some tapered to their tips;
Some sometimes wag with glee.

Some tails are hinged a good way back;
Some less aloof there are;
Some form the body, make the track,
Yet hav of grace their share.

Some tails, like trail of ball-room belle,
More trouble are than good;
Some that in gorgeousness excel
Unfold in vainest mood.

Tails serve as tools, and serve as toys,
And some as good fly-switches;
While some are useful as decoys—
All hav their proper hitches.

DAGMAR MARIAGER.

[The above lines refer to mules—teeth and heels; to eel, tiger, dog, cow; to pig, ox, squirrel; to bird of paradise, alligator, and the lizard of India, which, to escape the pursuing bird of prey, detaches its tail, leaving it dancing to attract and bewilder its foe; to frogs, tentacled fish, and the nautilus, which curls its members into a single wheel; to birds on the wing, swallows, fish, dog, etc.; to four-footed, two-footed, and no-footed animals (moles); to peacocks, beaver, kitten, cows, and several species of wild animals that wave their tails erect to attract the curiosity of their prey.—ED. Only Common Salt.

Very common, indeed, is salt, but it is one of the most important articles in use. It is the only mineral substance proverbially used everywhere by man and beast. Its use is of ancient origin. In olden times, when it was the custom to offer sacrifices to Jehovah, the burnt sheep and oxen were seasoned with salt to make them more palatable. It was formerly the custom to rub new babies in salt to giv them strength, as was thought. It was considered a mark of hospitality to offer salt to a guest, which is still kept up in some Eastern countries. To eat salt with one was thought to perpetuate friendship.

To spill the salt was considered an ill omen, and foretold a quarrel—which, another superstition asserts, might be averted by burning some of the spilled salt upon the stove.

Table salt is made from brine, and is found in various parts of the world, notably in Syracuse, N. Y.; but there are several different kinds of salt, prepared after different forms. The brine is pumped up from below the surface into large vats, and is passed into big iron pans. The water is then boiled, and the salt crystals form, which are drawn into ovens and subjected to great heat, which hardens them, so that they can be crushed fine, when it is sifted and is then ready for market.

In making coarse salt, the sea water is run into shallow ponds right from the ocean. The entrance to the pond is closed, and the sun and the wind make the salt. If it is very dry and windy, the salt will be a good article, but if damp and not very windy weather prevails, the salt will be fine-grained and a poor quality. The West Indies furnish a good deal of salt, the best known being Turk's Island and Curacoa. Russia, Algeria, Ireland, Santo Domingo, England, and Louisiana furnish what is termed rock salt, which is very pure and clear from foreign atoms.

The value of salt for flavoring and preserving cannot be estimated, and it is grateful even to cattle, who would die if not given a certain quantity with their food.

It is useful as a tonic in small quantities, and very effectiv in checking hemorrhages. It has been known to cure some forms of dyspepsia, and salt-water baths are considered stimulating and luxurious.

Plato called salt "a substance dear to the gods," but, whether the gods care for it or not, we know it is healthful and beneficial to man, and that without it he would be apt to pine, sicken, and die. S. H. W.

Amusing Philosophy.—No. 1.

THE WAGON WHEEL.—We need not wander into the realms of abstract science, nor study the concrete problems of philosophy, to find things that are striking and strange. The most common objects, if closely observed, are found to hav properties that are even startling. For instance, think of the wagon wheel. How many people know that the upper part of the wheel has a much greater velocity than the lower part? Even a majority of teamsters hav not observed this, and nine-tenths of the "learned folk" hav never thought of it. Yet it is a fact that the upper extremity of the wheel goes, not only much faster than the lower extremity, but more than a million times as fast—yes, more than ten billion times as fast! In fact, there is one point of the wheel that never moves, and that is the lower extremity—the point that falls in a line perpendicular to the axle.

It will readily be seen that the tire of the wheel revolves about the axle with the same velocity that the wagon moves forward. Then, since the upper extremity moves in the same direction as the wagon, it has its own velocity plus the wagon's velocity, which givs it twice the velocity of the wagon; and since the lower extremity moves in a direction opposit to that of the wagon, it has its own velocity minus the velocity of the wagon, which leaves it no velocity; therefore, it never moves.

This may be made to seem paradoxical, however, when we urge the objection that if the lower extremity of the wheel never moves, it cannot change its position, and a point, once on the ground, must remain there. But it is easily seen that when the point, in a line drawn perpendicular to the center, moves, it is no longer the lower extremity; or, in other words, when any point in the tire has fallen to the ground, it must stop before it begins to rise, and as soon as this point has begun to rise another takes its place, so there is always one point that is not moving.

The Little Householder.

"Oh, yes, I hav all kinds of tenants," said a kind-faced old gentleman; "but the one I like the best is a child not more than ten years of age. A few years ago I got a chance to buy a piece of land over on the west side, and I did so. I noticed that there was an old coop of a house on it, but paid no attention to it. After a while a man came to me and wanted to know if I would rent it to him.

"'What do you want it for?' said I.

"'To liv in,' he replied.

"'Well,' I said, 'you can hav it. Pay me what you think it is worth to you.'

"The first month he brought $2, and the next month a little boy who said he was the man's son came with $3. After that I saw the man once in awhile, but in the course of time the boy paid the rent regularly, sometimes $2 and sometimes $3. One day I asked the boy what had become of his father.

"'He's dead, sir,' was the reply.

"'Is that so?' said I. 'How long since?'

"'More'n a year,' he answered.

"I took his money, but made up my mind that I would go over and investigate, and the next day I drove over there. The old shed looked quite decent. I knocked at the door and a little girl let me in. I asked for her mother. She said she didn't hav any.

"'Where is she?' said I.

"'We don't know, sir. She went away after my father died, and we've never seen her since.'

"Just then a little girl about three years old came in, and I learned that these three children had been keeping house together for a year and a half, the boy supporting his two little sisters by blacking boots and selling newspapers, and the elder girl managing the house and taking care of the baby. Well, I just had my daughter call on them, and we keep an eye on them now. I thought I wouldn't disturb them while they are getting along. The next time the boy came with the rent I talked with him a little and then I said:

"'My boy, you're a brick. You keep right on as you hav begun, and you will never be sorry. Keep your little sisters together and never leave them. Now, look at this.'

"'I showed him a ledger in which I had entered up all the money that he had paid me for rent, and I told him it was all his with interest. 'You keep right on,' says I, 'and I'll be your banker, and when this amounts to a little more I'll see that you get a house somewhere of your 'own.' That's the kind of tenant to hav."—Chicago Herald.

Correspondence.

MT. ALTON, PA., Aug. 11, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been trying to get mamma to help me write a letter for the Corner; but she says, "No, you must write it yourself." So here you hav it. My papa is taking THE TRUTH SEEKER on trial. We all are so delighted with it that I think we could never do without it. I like the Children's Corner very much. I am anxious to help the cause along. I am a Liberal every time, and so are all my folks. I am ten years old. I hav a little brother, Eli, seven years old. He says he would like to write, too. I hav two large brothers; one often writes for papers. Little brother and I go to school when school keeps. It is vacation now. I am in the intermediate room. Our last year's teacher was a splendid Christian, and believed in forcing the Bible doctrin on the children in the way of pounding and kicking. He is a great scientist, but his science is no more true than his Bible. One day he told us that, if we dig twenty-five miles in the earth, we will come to the other side. One of the girls said, "What side?" "Why, China, of course." We are a-going to hav a teacher next year that knows something. Then our backwoods buckwheat will get left, and will hav to farm it.

This is a Catholic town, and I hav heaps of fun with the Catholic children. They say: "Oh, you little Infidel, what are you? You don't believe in the church, and you won't go to heaven." I say, "I don't want to go there, if all the Catholics are there."

Well, I will close; hope this will do to publish. If so, I will write again.

GEORGE FAIRCHILD.

HIGHTOWER, FORSYTH CO., GA., July 30, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: When I wrote before, I did not hav much idea of seeing it in print. Consequently, I hav received several packages, for which I write this, thanking the donors from the bottom of my better judgment. This is the time of year that our Christian friends meet to appease their God by several protracted meetings. They are all marked off for next month, and you ought to be here to help sympathize with me. Such howling, bawling, dancing, slapping of hands, you never saw or heard. They generally all become reconciled by the last of September. I like the pictures and Children's Corner very much. Thanking you and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I shall close.

NELLY H. GUTHREY.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IA., July 31, 286.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time, Children's Corner especially. The short stories are splendid. I hav been visiting out West for the last month, and learned to row. Some of us girls were playing prayer for fun; my little cousin said, "If I die before I wake, I pray thee send me to Aunt May's to be cremated." Aunt May (whom I liv with) is an enthusiast on cremation, and has converted her boy, myself, and cousin. I am enjoying vacation splendidly. I am studying hard to fit myself for the battle of life, so I can help myself and others also. If you think this worthy of a place in Children's Corner I will write again.

MAUDE JACKSON.

SALEM, ILL., Aug. 11, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is with pleasure that I state that my friend of North Carolina, Mr. Rideout, is still my correspondent, and has sent a leaflet of pictures which I admire very much. I am attending an institute in the city of Salem, as that is our county seat. I like it very much. We hav not had a good rain here for nearly two months, and you may imagin about the condition of things. There is a large negro camp-meeting here at the fair grounds. They always charge ten cents at the gate Sunday nights and then go around and beg some eight or ten dollars at the amphitheater. I think if they wanted to do God a favor they would not ask for money; but as it is they all seem to love the Lord, but at the same time I think they like that almighty dollar better than the Lord, as they call it. Well, I will close for this time, wishing you success. RUFUS O. WILLIAMS.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Solenhofen.*

Under-world of Solenhofen,
Tell me what thy tablets hold,
Trace for me thy buried ocean,
Yield thy white-veiled bride of old;
Solenhofen's primal glory,
Annals of her early dead,
Left to later song and story
Aught the Runic sages said.

Treasure-trove of monsters olden,
Winged life and perfect forms,
Gift of all the ages golden,
White beds hold thy 'prisoned charms.
Swarming hosts and herding creatures,
Bird and beast in one are blent,
Joining past to clearer futures—
Evolution's monument.

Falling on thy mighty marches,
Fatherland across the sea,
Sounding 'neath the waking arches
Chimings from thy gilded key.
In the distance, Solenhofen,
Footfalls on the dreamy Rhine,
Heard beyond the German Ocean,
Wand'ring in thy gal'ried mine.

Solenhofen, weird with wonder,
Let pale science ask of thee
Threads of light thy white hills under
Mend her fortunes o'er the sea;
Strands of deeper thought that denser
Weave her records, stronger grown,
Granit page, the world's dispenser—
Solenhofen, claim thine own.

All thy white walls' hoarded treasures
Volumes be of ancient lore;
Poets soon shall sing the measures
Ringing from that Saxon shore.
Tell them, Solenhofen, biding
O'er the tomb of peopled swells,
Songs the storied years were hiding
In their argosy of shells.

Rhineland, sweeping to the ocean
Ere the Saxon bow was drawn,
Cradled low at Solenhofen
Features of the whispered dawn.
Dusky morn of savage races
Dreamed of no bright zenith's brim,
Sought no smile on kindred faces,
In the shallows murk and dim.

Nature reared her mountain steeples
In the cloistered twilight days,
And no cry of bells nor peoples
Thrilled the narrow, beaten ways.
Not a bark upon the ocean,
Not a lover on the leas,
Yet a bride was Solenhofen—
Wedded to the centuries.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

*The Solenhofen beds are a famous group of lithographic slates found at Solenhofen, in Bavaria, singularly rich in well-preserved fossils, including many insects, several saurians, several species of pterodactyls, and a wonderful bird.

Book Notices.

THE OPTIMISM OF RALPH WALDO EMERSON. By Wm. F. Dana. Cloth; pp. 64. Price, 75 cents. Boston: Cupples, Upham & Co. Can be had through this office.

This book is written in a clear and fascinating style, and is a thoughtful and important work, which thinkers may with profit read and ponder. Its drift may be well indicated by subjoining its table of contents: "The necessity of knowing the thought-tendency of the age in which a man livs; Review of nineteenth century ideas; Cause of the general pessimism; Emerson's system of optimism; Conclusion." Our space will giv room for a few random extracts:

"The nineteenth century, as a literary epoch, dates back to a time much before the year 1800. The appearance of Voltaire really marks the opening of the era. Of all the men of his time, Voltaire worked most in the modern spirit. With him, properly, any account of recent thought should begin. . . . Thus, then, to sum up what I would hav to say as to the cause of nineteenth century pessimism: The root of our difficulties is in the fact that we hav lost faith in a revealed religion. We do not believe the Bible an inspired book. Hence we hav to form a religion by ourselvs out of the materials within us and about us. It has seemed impossible to us, unless we abandoned our reason, to believe that what appears to us good and evil could be all-good. For such a belief we needed a divine assurance; and that, we feel, has never been given to the world. . . . And if our faith in the Bible as a divinely inspired book is taken from us, what is left? What aim can we hav which may not at once be shown a mere personal caprice, or, at best, a blind faith? We are all told to work for others' good; but why so work? 'I do not care to.' We are commanded to obey our conscience. But why our conscience? 'I see not the need.' . . . We still, however, persist in seeking a solution to the problem; and, still always falling, we are thrown into despondency, and despair, and pessimism. Into such an age of intellectual gloom, and with such questions before him, came Ralph Waldo Emerson, one of the few higher, spiritual voices of the century who hav spoken in clear, unmistakable tones of hopefulness and cheer. . . A mind of such temper, ready to look at everything unflinchingly, could not fail to regard revealed religion as a thing incomprehensible, and even impossible. There was too strong a belief in reality, and too high a confidence in the universality and inflexibility of natural laws. And such really was the fact with Emerson. He did not believe in the divinity of Christ, nor yet in the inspiration of the Bible. To him such statements were unintelligible. . . . The difficulty, then, according to Emerson, was that man was not obedient enough to nature. He either did not know, or did not mind, her laws scrupulously enough. The world was good, but laws there were which man must heed. Unless he did so, not only he, but his descendants, might suffer the consequences of his neglect. Disease was the result of some infraction of nature's laws, either on our own part or on the part of others. What we hav to learn is to be more submissiv to the unhalting law; and, when disaster comes, to remember that better a thousand times our disaster than any swerving from the principle of cause and effect."

THE PEOPLE'S PROBLEM. AND ITS SOLUTION. By Wm. H. Lyon. Cloth; pp. 166. Price, 75 cents. Order through this office.

This book, the author states, represents to a considerable extent the views of the leading Knights of Labor, and thoroughly indorses some of the most important principles of that order. The author first reviews the present unfortunate condition of wage-workers in a chapter from the table of contents of which we gather the following heads: "Increase of wealth and poverty—Terrible condition of sewing women—Labor-saving machinery has not lightened toil—It broadens chasm between rich and poor—Disappointing effects of emancipation—Bosh of political economists—Railway consolidation—Description of bonanza farms—Dismal outlook—Failure of representativ government—Recent riots—World trembling on verge of revolution." Next is a review and condemnation of most proposed remedies. On Prohibition the author remarks: "The average wages of our working classes will barely provide the common necessaries of life, and intemperance therefore cannot be alone to blame. There is also an important fact which is often overlooked. Statistics show, as a frequent, if not a general thing, that drunkenness among the working class is the effect and not the cause of poverty. They drink to forget their misery, and remember their poverty no more." He next considers, and pronounces inefficient, the proposed remedies of "more currency, lessening overproduction, going West, opening foreign markets, free trade, protection, Christianity, education, Henry George's scheme," and many others. Coöperation is also examined, and pronounced an insufficient solution.

His own proposed remedy we cannot here treat in detail. Among its main features are the possession by the government of the telegraphs, railroads, mines, manufactures, and much other property; and a substitution for the present representativ legislativ system of a system of elections and law-making directly by the people.

The book is well written, and is unusually well supplied with verifying facts, figures, and statistics.

SCIENCE ECONOMIC DISCUSSION. 12mo; pp. 136. Price, 50 cents. New York: The Science Company. Can be had of this office.

The publishers of Science hav just issued a valuable contribution to the present momentous discussion of economic questions. The volume is made up of eleven articles, contributed by the most distinguished representativs of varying schools of economics. Both the new and the old school are represented, each criticising the other's contributions. It is evident that a discussion of this nature must be of the highest value in elucidating the truth of the matter. We cannot quote at length any of the valuable thought with which the volume is filled, advising our readers to buy and read it themselvs; and can find space for only the following sentences illustrating the deference that the most conservativ are now being forced to pay radicalism: "To understand any organism better than others means to hold opinions about it which differ from those ordinarily current. . . Every political economist who has done anything to advance the science has at one time been thought to go too far in some respect. Adam Smith is now considered a conservativ, but in his day he was called a dangerous man; and he has even been reproached with Socialism. Adolph Wagner, in Germany, who is now found to be a pillar of conservatism, was a few years ago considered so radical that prudent men doubted his ability to accomplish good. The common reproach has always been, 'He goes too far.'"

MARCUS BRUTUS AND OTHER VERSES. By Walter Hubbell. New York: Brentano Bros. Price, 50 cents. Can be had through this office.

The author is an actor of reputation, who has before written a valuable biographical and genealogical work. The book is pervaded by an enlightened tone of thought which must be welcome to those who hav wearied of poetry perverted to the service of superstition. From a poem entitled "Iconoclastic Reason," we giv the following:

"Forms hav changed in by-gone ages,
Man has grown in intellect;
Science, led by reason, wages
Still its war on every sect.

"World and life were not created;
Force and dust were always here;
Myths that are in books narrated
Sprung from ignorance and fear."

A LETTER TO GROVER CLEVELAND on His False Inaugural Address, Usurpations and Crimes of Law-makers and Judges, and the Consequent Poverty, Ignorance, and Servitude of the People. By Lysander Spooner. Large octavo; pp. 110. Price, 35 cents. Boston: Benj. R. Tucker. Supplied by this office.

This is a work that will well repay perusal. It was originally published in instalments in Liberty, Mr. Tucker's Anarchistic organ, and met with such favor that it is now republished. Its scathing arraignment of the present government and exposure of its multitudinous abuses and atrocities is perhaps the best-argued and most thorough and correct presentation of the matter yet published. Its advocacy of Anarchism as a substitute may not meet with equal approval from readers, but even anti-Anarchists will overlook a few objectionable views in admiration of the thoroughness of its exposure and denunciation of present wrongs.

THE HISTORICAL JESUS AND THE MYTHICAL CHRIST. By Gerald Massey. Octavo; pp. 232. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents. Springfield: Star Publishing Co. Can be had from this office.

This book is written to show the identity of Christianity with the astrological myths of Egypt. The evidence is taken from the monuments of Egypt and from the Egyptian "Book of the Dead." Our readers are familiar with the author as an eminent poet and Freethinker. By studying the Egyptian hieroglyphics for twelve years, Mr. Massey has disclosed the myth, and in this work adduces much evidence to prove that Christianity is a cult borrowed from the ancient religion of Egypt. His work is not speculation, but stands upon facts. It is taken from records left upon earth and still to be read.

"First Lessons on Money," is the title of the latest work on the money question. It is written by B. T. Roberts, A.M., and published at Rochester, N. Y. On the title-page appears the quotation: "A man should make it a part of his religion to see that his country is well governed."—William Penn. Mr. Roberts is informed that said process of "making" care for one's country part of his religion is an altogether unnecessary operation for the Freethinker; he whose religion is the religion of humanity has that duty already embraced in his creed. With Christians the case may be different. In his introduction he says: "I hav witnessed the distress that the bad management of our finances by our national government has produced, and the injury that has been done by the same cause to our religious and benevolent enterprises." Such disastrous consequences of neglect spur one to renewed exertions to attend to the matter. "With money itself every person is familiar." This is not so. We liv on terms of close daily intimacy with a person to whom money is not at all familiar. The author follows, however, with a more sensible remark, a consideration that it is well to impress upon the masses who, confused by uninformed and unsuccessful attempts to solve the problem, hav got the notion, noted by Bagehot, that the money market is so impalpable that it can only be spoken of in very abstract words, and that, therefore, books on it must be exceedingly difficult. "Money is a human invention. Therefore, the money question is a question that can be understood. What is made by man can be comprehended by man. The mechanism of a watch is intricate, but one who studies it with diligence may learn all about its construction and movements. So, whoever givs a proper attention to the machinery by which the wheels of trade and commerce are kept moving can gain all the knowledge respecting it which is necessary for practical purposes. . . . Mr. Walter Bagehot says, 'I maintain that the money market is as concrete and real as anything else; that it can be described in as plain words; that it is the writer's fault if what he says is not clear.'" The author's further views are sensibly and well expressed in the remainder of the 160 pages composing the volume. It is perhaps as good as most books on the finance question. Its price is 50 cents, and, like all other books our readers may need, it can be obtained from this office.

For all interested in scientific and economical questions, Science, the illustrated weekly now coming into prominence, is an excellent periodical. It contains the freshest scientific information of the day. It maintains special correspondents in Paris, London, St. Petersburg, Tokio, Washington, and other centers of scientific activity, thus obtaining prompt information of the work of scientific men and societies the world over. It should receive the support of all who aim at scientific culture, publishing, as it does, a weekly record of the whole world's progress. Its recent publication of the noted "composit photographs" is attracting great attention. The subscription is $5 per year. Like all other periodicals, it can be subscribed to through this office.

Paine Vindicated!

A thorough and overwhelming reply to the New York Observer's slanderous attacks upon the Author-Hero of the American Revolution. Containing both the slanders and their refutation.

BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The New York Observer (Presbyterian) having recently reissued its assault upon the memory of Paine, this pamphlet should be circulated everywhere in vindication.

UNIVERSAL HISTORY
FOR HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. J. M Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2,000 years B.C. on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Stenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixon.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable. It may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

OF
BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

ANNUAL CONVENTION

OF THE

NEW YORK STATE

FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION,

TO BE HELD AT

White Sulphur Springs Park, Saratoga Co., New York.

From Thursday, Sept. 2d, to Sunday, Sept. 12th, 1886.

Reduction on all railroad routes. Special excursion rates to Saratoga from all points.

The best Liberal speakers will be in attendance. The following is the list so far as they hav accepted: John Peck—subject, "The Gods on Exhibition;" Lucy N. Colman—subjects, "Reminiscences in the Life of a Reformer," and "Woman's Duty To-day in the World's Work;" W. S. Bell—subject, "Conflict Between Christianity and Civilization;" Mrs. F. C. Reynolds—subject, "Woman: Past, Present, and Future;" J. L. Andrew—subject, "Modern Infidelity;" Miss Susan H. Wixon.

Splendid facilities are afforded for boating, bathing, fishing, driving; magnificent scenery. The best dancing pavilion in the state. Fine band. Everything necessary to an enjoyable occasion. All the advantages of a visit to Saratoga will be afforded visitors, thus combining the attractions of that popular watering-place with those of the convention.

Season tickets, admitting the bearer to all lectures, $1.00. First-class board, $1.00 per day. (It will greatly facilitate matters if orders for season tickets with remittance accompany applications for rooms.) Applications for tickets and rooms should be addressed to C. B. Reynolds, 33 Clinton Place, New York. Contributions, necessary to defray preliminary expenses, may be sent to the treasurer, E. M. Macdonald.

THE poet of Tid-Bits, becoming indignant at the lack of general information as to the qualities needed by a newspaper poet, thus attempts to catalog them. "The orthodox poet and slinger of meter should be a sound sleeper and vigorous eater; join the learning of Paul to the fervor of Peter; know the balancing rhymes and the rhythmical teeter of lilacs and smilax, of zephyrs and heifers, of ballads and salads, of over-arched bowers and greenery flowers; and work on one rhyme for hours and hours. Know the whole range of history from Cleveland to Priam, and the thought of all lands from New Brunswick to Siam, and work like a drudge at a dollar per diem, love all lovely objects, with no cash to buy 'em, such as roses and posies, and mountains and fountains, and pictures and fixtures, and gorgeous pavilions for Lauras and Lillians, and a large bank deposit far up in the millions. His lines should be full of nabobs and emirs, of giaours and khans and Orient dreamers, of cymbals and chawms and victorious streamers, and end in a climax of glory and screamers, with clashing and slashing! with roaring and pouring! with lunging and plunging! and bust in a chasm of blank protoplasm in a gunpowder chaos and dynamite spasm!"

SUFFICIENT unto the day is the evil thereof"—sufficient, but not intolerable. But if we look abroad, and bring into one day's thoughts the evil of many, certain and uncertain, what will be and what will never be, our load will be as intolerable as it is unreasonable.—Jeremy Taylor.

IF a man's mind be deeply seasoned with the consideration of the mortality and corruptible nature of things, he will easily concur with Epictetus, who went forth one day and saw a woman weeping for her pitcher of earth that was broken; and went forth the next day and saw a woman weeping for her son that was dead, and thereupon said, "Yesterday I saw a fragil thing broken, and to-day I saw a mortal die."—Lord Bacon.

THE theology of the present has become more scientific than that of the past; because it has not only renounced idols of wood and idols of stone, but begins to see the necessity of breaking in pieces the idols built up of books, and traditions, and fine-spun ecclesiastical cobwebs, and of cherishing the noblest and most human of man's emotions by worship "for the most part of the silent sort" at the altar of the Unknown and Unknowable. — Huxley's Lay Sermons.

GREAT revolutions cannot be accomplished without much anguish and some evil being caused. Did not the Roman women suffer when the Christians came and robbed them of their gods, and raised their minds, through pain and sorrow, to a higher faith? The religion which I teach is as high above Christianity as that religion was superior to the idolatry of Rome. And when the relativ civilizations of the two ages are compared, this fetich of ink and paper, this Syrian book, is, in truth, not less an idol than those statues which obtained the adoration of the Italians and the Greeks. The statues were beautiful as statues the book is admirable as a book [who so readeth, let him consider with how many and how great limitations this rash and unworthy assertion can be received]; but the statues did not come down from heaven; the book was not a magical composition; it bears the marks, not only of human genius, but also of human depravity and superstition.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

WHEN Milton began to compose "Paradise Lost," he had the reading of a lifetime behind him. His imagination worked upon an accumulated store, to which books, observation, and reflection had contributed in equal proportions. He drew from this store without conscious distinction of its sources. Not that this was a recollected material, to which the poet had recourse whenever invention failed him; it was identified with himself. His verse flowed from his own soul, but it was a soul which had grown up nourished with the spoil of all the ages. He created his epic, as metaphysicians hav said that God created the world, by drawing it out of himself, not by building it up out of the elements supplied ab extra (outside of himself).—Mark Pattison's Milton. [NOTE:

When Berkeley said there was no matter,
It was no great matter what he said;

and when metaphysicians tell us that God evolved matter out of himself, and not out of pre-existing material, they are surely soaring or sinking into a region of which they, as well as the theologians, are supremely ignorant.—Hylax.]

WHEN it shall please God to bring thee to man's estate, use great providence and circumspection in choosing thy wife, for from thence will spring all thy future good or evil. And it is an action of life like unto a stratagem of war, wherein a man can err but once. If thy estate be good, watch near home and at leisure; if weak, far off and quickly. Inquire diligently of her disposition, and how her parents hav been inclined in their youth. Let her not be poor, how generous (well-born) soever; for a man can buy nothing in the market with gentility. Nor choose a base and uncomely creature altogether for wealth, for it will cause contempt in others and loathing in thee. Neither make choice of a dwarf or a fool; for by the one thou shalt beget a race of pigmies, the other will be thy continued disgrace, and it will yiske (Yankee rite) thee to hear her talk; for thou shalt find it, to thy great grief, that there is nothing more fulsome than a she fool.—Lord Burleigh's Advice to his Son.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

CASTING PEARLS BEFORE SWINE—C. B REYNOLDS IN NEW JERSEY.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Southern Churchman is shocked at the idea that a woman should "preach the gospel and administer sacraments, without one word of approval from Christ or his apostles."

AT Brianconn, France, Catherine Ollagnier, a few days ago murdered her sister Marie, with whom she lived. She told Marie that the Lord had appeared to her and told her to sacrifice her sister as a proof of her devotion, and then killed her with a razor.

PROHIBITION, its friends claim, prohibits in most counties in Kansas. According to reports received by the attorney-general from seventy-two of the eighty-five counties, eighty per cent of the arrests for liquor-selling resulted in conviction, and only fifty per cent of arrests for other crimes.

AT the New York city Seaman's Bethel Evangelist McGuire recently preached on a text treating of the self-sacrifice of Christ, "Who, though he was rich, yet for us he became poor." In illustrating this theme, Mr. McGuire probably abounded more in wise saws than in modern instances.

ON August 29th a powder magazine in Chicago exploded, from being struck by lightning, with a shock felt many miles away, killing four persons and injuring many. The Jesuit church of the Holy Family being badly shaken, a destructiv panic ensued, and admonitions to remain seated from a few with presence of mind were drowned in passionate appeals for help from crushed and down-trodden women and children.

A WRITER in the Independent cries for honesty and reform in church-building enterprises, stating that in all such there abound "disreputable frauds, shams, scandals, sharp practice, dishonest economy, over-reaching," and "disputes that so often occur in church-building committees that they hav rendered them a by-word and dread among builders and architects."

IN a recent sermon Rev. Dr. Patton said, on the text, "A glorious church:" "The church of Christ is a glorious church if regard is had to its history. It embodies the two greatest and most glorious truths in the universe—the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man. It is glorious if regard is had to its adaptation to human needs." Meaning, no doubt, the needs of the ministers.

A RESULT of the last important debate in Parliament is that the Irish landlords' chances of being bought out at the cost of the rate-payers of the three kingdoms are gone forever. Gladstone's pamphlet on the Irish question, which has just been published, makes it clear that he will never again try an attempt to buy out the Irish landlords. He says, "Their sands are fast running out."

IN a recent letter to a friend, Parsons, the Anarchist, says: "The capitalist system has its morality—a plastic, convenient morality—which it puts on or off like a coat. The golden rule of the carpenter's son is made subservient to the laws of trade, whose morality and religion are expounded in the churches (temples of mammon) where the clergy propagate that good philosophy which teaches man (poor man) that he is here to suffer, denouncing as Atheistic and Anarchistic that other philosophy, which says to man: 'Go! the earth is the gift of God to the whole human race. Discover nature's laws, apply them, and be happy.'"

THE Rev. Mr. Leys, a minister of the Presbyterian church of Scotland, is now a prisoner in Calton jail, Edinburgh, for refusing to obey an order of the court to deliver up his grandchildren to their father. The father has come under the influence of the Roman Catholic church, and the old gentleman objects to giv up the children because he is unwilling that they should be brought up in the Catholic faith.

AT a recent Knight of Labor meeting a speaker said: "Mr. Blaine has cited the eighteen planks of our platform as Knights of Labor, and he has called the issues covered by these eighteen planks, 'side issues.' He has acknowledged that he has no remedy to offer for the existing labor troubles. What an acknowledgment for the statesman of thirty years' experience to make! It is a confession of perfect imbecility. He has no new ideas; he has what he calls an old nostrum. Mr. Blaine, who is protected? I recently examined the pay-roll of the miners of Hocking Valley, and there was an average of from $12 to $18 per month. There was a small army of Pinkerton's thugs going about with a whole arsenal of weapons strapped upon them, who were watching those miners, and yet the miners were supposed to be protected by a duty of fifty cents a ton upon the coal they risked their lives to mine. For twenty-five years we've had this protection Mr. Blaine offers us, and we hav made more millionaires and more paupers under that system than were ever made in a civilized country on the earth in the same time before."

THE Catholic Review is very frank in stating its attitude toward the public schools: "We are for perfect freedom of instruction," it says, "every day and all the time, without compromise with or dictation from the state, and our friends may as well understand first as last that if they do not grant us the privilege of teaching our religion in the public schools, as they do in other countries, and as is perfectly practicable and perfectly fair and just, then we shall go on building our schoolhouses and emptying theirs."

THREE weeks ago the World started the story that Colonel Ingersoll was going to Paris to have his throat fixed. The Star prints the sequel: "Nobody seems to know just how the report arose that Col. Bob Ingersoll was going to Paris to have his throat operated upon. Judge Cowing says that Lawyer Newcombe told him so. Lawyer Newcombe says Lawyer Strahan intimated that such was the case. Lawyer Strahan says that he supposed, of course, the colonel ought to go, while Colonel Bob himself swears by all that's Agnostic that he never had any idea of going, never said he was going. But perhaps the most flabbergasted man of all was dear little Dr. Robertson, physician-in-extraordinary to the colonel, who returned from Europe last week and heard the dreadful stories of his patient's relapse. He had made a study of that throat, it was his pet pathological amour. He rushed off to see his distinguished friend, pried open the massiv jaw, and gazed into its eloquent depths. 'Why, colonel, your throat's all right. It's just lovely! Why go to Paris?' 'Who the —— said I was going to Paris? I'm off to the White Mountains. Want to come?'"

Evolution and Special Creation.

II.—DIVERSITY OF LIVING THINGS.

A mere glance at the geological records will show at once that the order in which animals and plants hav appeared on the earth is that which accords with evolution. The lowest came first, the highest last, and a regular gradation between the two extremes. In the early rocks in which life appears we meet with polypas, coral, sea-worms, etc., and no trace of land animals or plants. Then, passing upward, we come upon fishes, then reptils, afterward birds, subsequently mammals, and, last of all, man. These are undisputed facts, as the most elementary works on geology, whether written by a professing Christian or an unbeliever, will clearly show.

The only objection, perhaps, of any weight that can be urged against the changes which evolution asserts to hav taken place is the fact that we do not see them occur. But this, in the first place, is hardly correct, since we see the tadpole—which is a fish breathing through gills, and living in the water—pass up into a reptil, the frog—which is a land animal breathing through lungs, and inhaling its oxygen from the atmosphere. Secondly, the fact that we do not see a change actually occur which took millions of years to become effected can surely amount to nothing. An ephemeral insect, whose life only lasts for a day, could it reason, might object that an acorn could not grow into an oak-tree, because it had not seen it occur. But the evidence would be there still in the numerous gradations that might be seen between the acorn and the sturdy old tree that had weathered the storms of a century. And in this case we see all the gradations between a monad and a man in the rock which time has left in the history of the past, although, as our lives are so short, we are not able to see the whole change effected. Plants were not all suddenly called into existence at one particular period, and then animals at another and later time. This we know, because the remains of plants and animals are found side by side throughout all the rocks. If there be an exception, it is an unfortunate one for the Christian supernaturalist, since it shows that animals were first; for certain it is that animal remains are met with in the oldest rocks.

The objection to evolution that no transformation of one species into another has been seen within recorded history is entirely groundless, and betrays reckless carelessness upon the part of the objectors. The truth is, such transformations hav taken place as mentioned above in reference to the tadpole. Professor Huxley and other scientists hav proved this to be the case. It should, however, be remembered that in most instances these great changes are the work of time. As Dr. David Page observes: "It is true that to whatever process we ascribe the introduction of new species, its operation is so slow and gradual that centuries may pass away before its results become discernible. But no matter how slow, time is without limit, and if we can trace a process of variation at work it is sure to widen in the long run into what are regarded as specific distinctions. It is no invalidation of this argument that science cannot point to the introduction of any new species within the historic era; for till within a century or so science took no notice of either the introduction or extinction of species, nor was it sufficiently acquainted with the flora and fauna of the globe to determin the amount of variation that was taking place among their respectiv families. Indeed, influenced by the belief that the life of the globe was the result of one creativ act, men were unwilling to look at the long past which the infant science of paleontology was beginning to reveal, and never deigned to doubt that the future would be otherwise than the present. Even still there are certain minds who ignore all that geology has taught concerning the extinction of old races and introduction of newer ones, and who, shutting their eyes to the continuity of nature, cannot perceive that the same course of extinction and creation must ever be in progress" (Man: Where, Whence, and Whither?).

Let us now apply a similar demand to the creativ theory and what will be the result? An utter failure upon the part of the creationists to substantiate their dogmatic pretensions. Suppose we exclaimed, "Show us a single creativ act of one species within recorded history." It would be impossible to do so, for there is not a shadow of evidence drawn from human experience in favor of what theologians call creation. "We perceive a certain order and certain method in nature; we see that under new conditions certain variations do take place in vegetable and animal structures, and by an irresistible law of our intellect we associate the variations with the conditions in the way of cause and effect. Of such a method we can form some notion, and bring it within the realm of reason; of any other plan, however it may be received, we can form no rational conception." "The whole analogy of natural operations," says Professor Huxley, "furnishes so complete and crushing an argument against the intervention of any but what are called secondary causes in the production of all the phenomena of the universe, that, in view of the intimate relations between man and the rest of the living world, and between the forces exerted by the latter and all other forces, I can see no excuse for doubting that all are coördinated terms of nature's great progression, from the formless to the formed, from the inorganic to the organic, from blind force to conscious intellect and will." The most that can be said of the creativ theory is that it is a question of belief, but of knowledge never. Dr. Page observes: "We may believe in a direct act of creation, but we cannot make it a subject of research; faith may accept, but reason cannot grasp it. On the other hand, a process of derivation by descent is a thing we can trace as of a kind with other processes; and, though unable to explain, we can follow it as an indication, at least, of the method which nature has adopted in conformity with her ordinary and normal course of procedure. We can admit possibilities, but must reason from probabilities, and the probable can only be judged of from what is already known. Than this there is clearly no other course for philosophy. Everywhere in nature it sees nothing save processes, means, and results, causes and effects, and it cannot conceive, even if it wished, of anything being brought about unless through the instrumentality of means and processes."

To me it has always been a difficulty to understand how an infinit being could possibly hav been the creator of all things. For this reason: If he is infinit, he is everywhere; if everywhere, he is in the universe; if in the universe now, he was always there. If he was always in the universe, there never was a time when the universe was not; therefore it could never hav been created.

If it be said that this being was not always in the universe, then there must hav been a period when he occupied less space than he did subsequently. But lesser and greater cannot be applied to that which is eternally infinit. Further, before we can recognize the soundness of the position taken by advocates of special creation, we hav to think of a time when there was no time, of a place where there was no place. Is this possible? If it were, it would be interesting to learn where an infinit God was at that particular period, and how in "no time" he could perform his creativ act. Besides, if a being really exists who created all things, the obvious question at once is, "Where was this being before anything else existed?" "Was there a time when God over all was God over nothing? Can we believe that a God over nothing began to be out of nothing, and to create all things when there was nothing?" Moreover, if the universe was created, from what did it emanate? From nothing? But, "from nothing, nothing can come." Was it created from something that already was? If so, it was no creation at all, but only a continuation of that which was in existence. Further, "creation needs action; to act is to use force; to use force implies the existence of something upon which that force can be used. But if that 'something' were there before creation, the act of creating was simply the re-forming of preëxisting materials." Here three questions may be put to the opponents of evolution who affirm the idea of special creation: (1) Is it logical to affirm the existence of that of which nothing is known either of itself or by analogy? Now, it cannot be alleged that anything is known of the supposed supernatural power of creation. On the other hand, sufficient is known of the facts of evolution to prevent the careful student of nature from attempting to rob her of that force and life giving principle which undoubtedly belongs to her. (2) Is it logical to ascribe events to causes the existence of which is unknown, and more particularly when such events can be reasonably explained upon natural principles with the aid of "the science of probabilities?" Dr. Page forcibly remarks: "Man has his natural history relations—of that there can be no gainsaying—and we merely seek to apply to the determination of these the same methods of research which by common consent are applied to the determination of the relations of other creatures. . . Scientific research must abide by scientific methods; scientific convictions must rest on scientific investigations." To assent that life is associated with something that is immaterial and immortal, and that this force could only hav been brought into existence by a special act of "the one great creator," is to prostrate reason and experience to the assumptions of an over-satisfied theology. To once more use the words of Dr. Page: "Science knows nothing of life save through its manifestations. With the growth of physical organization it comes; with the decay of organization it disappears. While life endures, mind is its accompaniment; when life ceases, mental activity comes to a close. Thus far we can trace; beyond this science is utterly helpless. No observation from the external world; no analogy, however plausible; no analysis, however minute, can solve the problem of an immaterial and immortal existence." (3) Is it logical to urge the theory of special creation when science proclaims the stability of natural law, and its sufficiency for the production of all phenomena? Professor Tyndall, in his lecture on "Sound," says that if there is one thing that science has demonstrated more clearly than another it is the stability of the operations of the laws of nature. We feel assured from experience that this is so, and we act upon such assurance in our daily life. The same eminent scientist, in his Belfast address, says: "Now, as science demands the radical extirpation of caprice, and the absolute reliance upon law in nature, there grew with the growth of scientific nations a desire and determination to sweep from the field of theory this mob of gods and demons, and to place natural phenomena on a basis more congruent with themselvs." Again, "Is there not a temptation to close to some extent with Lucretius when he affirms that 'nature is seen to do all things spontaneously of herself without the meddling of the gods,' or with Bruno when he declares that matter is not 'that mere empty capacity which philosophers hav pictured her to be, but the universal mother who brings forth all things as the fruit of her own womb?' . . By an intellectual necessity I cross the boundary of the experimental evidence, and discern in that matter which we, in our ignorance of its latent powers, and notwithstanding our professed reverence for its creator, hav hitherto covered with opprobrium, the promis and potency of all terrestrial life."

CHARLES WATTS.

(TO BE CONCLUDED.)

The Existence of a Personal God.

It is impossible—if we consider God to be the power that rules the universe—for any God to be worshiped as such unless he be an anthropomorphic God, or one represented as possessing human attributes and affections, for, denying as I do that man possesses a religious faculty, and believing that what is generally so called is composed of fear and credulity, it is very clear to me that all that there is of what is generally known as religious worship consists in the propitiation of some imaginary deity, in order that his anger may not be vented upon those who offer up, or anyone for whom they offer up, such propitiation, and who consider that did they not do something to pacify this angry deity some terrible misfortune would befall them in this world or their supposed next.

Now, anger, love, pleasure, pain, hatred, and jealousy are human attributes; and what is considered as being the Christian God is generally imagined as possessing all of these attributes. Consequently the Christian God is an anthropomorphic God, and it would be impossible for him to be worshiped (in a religious manner) unless he were such.

In regard to the location of God, we hav no data upon which to base an argument. It is a popular custom in Christian countries for Christian people to direct the eyes upward when speaking of the deity, and the holy man of God descants by the hour about his "great redeemer, up in heaven," forgetting, for the time, his brother-missionary in the antipodes, who—let us be charitable—is presumed to be doing nearly the same thing at about the same time. But this is no proof whatever, for if we remember that the earth is revolving around the sun at the rate of 65,500 miles an hour, at the same time that it is revolving upon its axis, and that the idea intended to be expressed is that God is up, we shall find that God, according to this idea, would occupy the whole of the universe (with the exception of the interior of the earth, which was, until the late revision of the Old Testament, devoted by our Christian friends to the rather warm abode of his satanic majesty, the devil). But this is not so, for we cannot philosophically conceive of a God having human attributes without his having a human form also; and this, as it necessitates his being a personal God, renders it impossible for him to occupy the whole of the universe (with the before-mentioned exception) because of his form. The Bible—which, by the way, is a book not to be relied on, on account of the many incredible and contradictory stories related therein, which are about on a par with those related in the "Arabian Nights"—tells us that God created man after his own likeness (see Gen. i, 27); consequently our Christian friends, if they believe, as they pretend to, in the Bible, must worship a personal God, or none at all.

In regard to the age of God we are, if possible, in a greater muddle than we were when we attempted to find out something regarding his location. In fact, God, if he be the ruler of the universe, can hav no determinable age, for if he has he certainly must hav had a beginning, and if he had a beginning he must hav been created by some power greater than himself, and that power, and not God, would be the power that rules the universe.

God knows all things, and is in possession of all facts, past, present, and future; because if he does not know all things, and is not in possession of all facts, past, present, and future, there is something in existence, or which at some future time will exist, of which God knows nothing, and consequently he is not the all-wise and powerful creator which it is necessary for him to be in order for him to be the power that rules the universe. Moreover, God must always hav known all things, and he must always hav been in possession of all facts, past, present, and future. If this is not so, then there must hav been a time when God was not in the possession of all facts, and did not know all things. But as we hav see that it is necessary for God to know all things and be in possession of all facts at the present time in order for him to be the power that rules the universe, he must hav received in the interim some knowledge from some source outside of himself, and consequently that source, and not God, would be the power that rules the universe.

Now, if God has a will, he knows it, and if he was ever going to change his will, he knew it before he changed it, and he also knew what that change was going to be, and as God is in possession of all facts, past, present, and future, and always was in possession of such facts, he knew before he created the universe just what man was going to do.

We cannot violate the will of God, for if we can, then I hold that that is conclusiv proof that man's will is more powerful than God's unless it be that God willed that his own will be not done, which would be a paradox.

God makes no mistakes, does nothing wrong, because all mistakes are the result of ignorance, and if God ever made a mistake it would show that he was not in possession of all facts, and did not know all things, and, consequently, could not be the power that rules the universe.

God never feels pleasure, pain, anger, love, or hatred, because if he does it is necessary that there be some power outside of himself which either opposes his will or contributes to the fulfilment of his desire. Both of these are impossibilities, however, the former because any power which can oppose God's will would necessarily be more powerful than he, and consequently would be the power that rules the universe, and not God; the latter because God has no desire, for if he has a desire it must be for something which he does not already possess; but if God is the ruler of the universe he must necessarily possess all things. God never feels jealous.

God never receives any knowledge or information unless he receives it from himself and by his own will, and that would be like pouring water from a glass into itself; it is impossible for him to receive it from any outside source, as he already is in possession of all knowledge and information.

God never thinks, because thinking is the effort of ignorance and weakness, or partial ignorance, to gain more knowledge; but as God is already in possession of all knowledge, it is impossible that he should think.

Men say that there must hav been a plan of the universe, and giv, as an example, a watch, with all its miniature and complicated machinery, stating that the watch could not hav been constructed unless a plan of it had first been made. This comparison, however, is ridiculous, because the atoms comprising the matter of which the watch is formed do not (in themselvs) possess the potentiality of forming themselvs into a watch with mechanism complete, while those comprising the universe most assuredly do possess the power in themselvs (attractiv and repulsiv forces) of forming themselvs into all the varied objects which it is possible for us or any animal to experience; but if we philosophically examin and consider the plan theory, we shall find that if God ever made a plan there must hav been a time before that plan was made, and since there must hav been an eternity previous to any given time, then there was an eternity during which God ruled the universe without a plan; but this was not so, for if God was ever going to change his mind or make a plan, he always knew it, for if he did not always know it then he must hav found it out when he made his plan; but if this was so, then he must hav received this information from some source which knew more than he did.

Now, I hav spoken of the will of God as though he exercised it at the present time, but he does not, for, having ordered anything to be and knowing that it will be, there can be no further exercise of will upon this object, for the reason that when once anything is obtained it is impossible for the same person to obtain the same thing again as long as that person keeps possession of it, as he already has it.

Now, if God willed that the universe exist and it did exist, then it was impossible for God to again will it to exist, as it existed already; nor could he hav exercised his will in making minor alterations in any way whatever in any part of the universe after he had once exercised his will in creating it as a whole, for, if he did, he must (as he knew before he created the universe just what he was going to create) hav made some mistake in his calculations.

But when did God exercise his will in creating the universe? Let us go back and try to fix the time, and we shall find that if God ever exercised his will in the creation of the universe, then there was a time before the universe was created; and since there must hav been an eternity previous to the time when God created the universe, then there was an eternity during which God was nothing, for he could not feel pleasure, pain, love, anger, hatred, or jealousy, nor could he think, desire, or receive any knowledge or information; and, what is stranger still, if God existed before the universe, he would hav been powerless to create it, as there would hav been nothing for him to exercise his will (supposing he had one) upon, and inversely nothing to excite his will to action. But it was impossible for God to exist before the universe, for the simple reason that the universe has always existed, for as void is a portion of the universe, and there never could hav been a time when void did not exist, then the universe must always hav existed—for the identity of void and matter (force?) was fully demonstrated by Sir Humphrey Davy when he proved the impossibility of a vacuum.

CHARLES F. GAUL.

Political Jesuitry.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A few days ago the people of this state (Iowa) were shocked by the report that the Rev. Mr. Haddock was foully murdered in the night by a crowd of ruffians who laid in wait for him. The shock and its consequent indignation were intensified when it became known that Mr. Haddock was an avowed Prohibitionist, and that his fidelity to that cause had brought on him the indignation of "the saloon element." The deceased clergyman is already canonized as a martyr, and the party that avowedly stands for Prohibition is making political capital out of the sad event. More than that, there is an ill-concealed pleasure over it, as it is supposed to be a strong argument in behalf of "law and order," etc.

One of the leading papers of this state lies before me, as I write, and givs the following from an exchange of a neighboring city:

> When the news reached this city that Rev. G. C. Haddock had been shot down in the streets of Sioux City by some unknown persons, a leading Republican of this city rubbed his hands together, and, with apparent glee, exclaimed, "That news is worth $10,000 to the Republican party of this state." At the indignation meeting held in the court-house that same evening this same gentleman told how sorry he was to hear of Mr. Haddock's death.

Every sensible person is aware that no good can result from killing our political opponents. But when the Prohibitionists are posing as law-abiding citizens, and the deceased gentleman is called a martyr, it is time for another voice to be heard. About two years ago, one of the most prominent Methodist preachers of Kansas, whose immoral conduct has since eclipsed his fame, gave an address in the largest city of Kansas, and advocated the burning of saloonkeepers' property. After his incendiary speech was delivered, he was suspicious of the impression he had produced, and after leaving the hall he was struck by a German. The partisan press exaggerated the affair, making it appear that the Rev. Dr. K—— was a martyr in the cause of temperance and morals.

I am acquainted with the following: A certain gentleman had secured a United States license to sell liquor, a license which permits him to sell beer in quantities of not less than a gallon. The Prohibitionists of the city where he livs, believing in the infamous Jesuitical doctrin that "the end justifies the means," one night emptied a can of kerosene oil on his building and then set fire to it. Recently, in Mississippi, the Prohibitionists terrified the colored voters, because they (the colored voters) were in favor of licensing the saloons.

Two cases hav happened in this city (Des Moines). About a year ago some one informed the authorities that a certain German—an old man, whose venerable wife was still living with him—kept beer and used it as a beverage, instead of for medicinal purposes. The old gentleman, as many other Germans do, would buy a barrel of beer and bottle it for his own use. Two unprincipled rascals, clothed with the authority of the state, entered the old folks' home, and instituted a search. Neither of them could well understand English. It so happened that the old lady was on a seat that rested on the cellar door. Not understanding their object, because not understanding our language, she remained on her seat. Finding her unwilling to move, one of them pointed a revolver at her, at which her husband rose in her defense. The brutes then assailed them both with their weapons and ran away. To make a long story short, the old man is unable to work and is a mental wreck as a consequence of the affray, and his wife is reduced to beggary and want.

Another "moral" affair happened in this same city only a few days ago. The home of an ex-saloonkeeper, one of the most highly respected men here, and deservedly so, was entered by a policeman; two bottles of beer were found in the refrigerator, and were immediately seized. The court decided that "there was no merit in the case," and ordered the beer restored to the owner. The above are but samples of numberless cases under which the law is executed.

Your regular readers know that I do not believe in Anarchy, but how much respect will any government receive from its citizens if, under factional influence, those rights are invaded which it proposes to protect? When government becomes the guilty aggressor, rebellion is the result. The laws of this state in relation to the liquor traffic are infamously unjust, and there is hardly a town where they are not more or less openly violated. To rectify a wrong by establishing another is the great crime of modern politics. If a man's home may be entered at any time by a policeman, who is clothed with authority to see what his family drink, it is also right to enter it for the purpose of seeing what they eat, read, etc., and we may see the principle of the Spanish Inquisition established in this country, but applied to diet as it was formerly applied to literature and belief. And what assurance hav we that it may not be applied to these latter as well as to the former?

It seems to me that we hav reached the climax of political hypocrisy and deceit. Some of the most intemperate men I hav met with are avowed Prohibitionists, and in all my travels, I believe, I can almost count on the fingers of my two hands those whom I know or believe to be consistent in their profession of temperance (Prohibition). If it were necessary, I could produce witnesses that many of the leading Prohibitionists in cities where I hav lectured are steady patrons of the new saloon, i. e., the drug store.

I hav not an unkind word or feeling toward those who, believing in the equity of Prohibition, abstain from the use of intoxicating beverages; but no language can express my contempt for men who publicly praise such a law and secretly violate it. "And their name is legion."

Organization and Science Schools.

No real advancement ever has been made in any cause without practical, efficient organization. There is an opinion among some good Liberals that, although organization is essential to success, we must wait for it to come of itself, rather than by energetic persistency inaugurate it.

While at Hempstead, Long Island, to deliver two lectures in the grove of that brave old veteran, Elisha Hyatt, it was my happy lot to become the guest of C. H. DeMott, a young man of more than ordinary intelligence, culture, and energy. He had attended the Albany convention of the New York Freethinkers' Association, but failed to get acquainted with other Liberals who were there from the same town, but he realized the necessity of organization at Hempstead, if opposition and ostracism were to be removed and the aims and object of Secularism become known to his friends and neighbors. Although the few Freethinkers of the town resided miles apart, he succeeded in arousing them to united effort, organized a local society, and succeeded in establishing a Freethought library and reading-room in the village of Hempstead—the first and only public reading-room in the town. To increase the interest and attract the young people, Mr. DeMott, being a proficient stenographer, instituted a free school, and has a most successful class in shorthand writing—the students becoming, by their associations and surroundings, familiarized with the principles of Secularism.

Finding the little society could not afford to hire experienced lecturers, although having no experience as a public speaker, he, despite his natural diffidence, prepared and delivered some very able lectures on astronomy, thus greatly increasing the general interest in the organization.

After my lecture on Sunday afternoon (15th inst.), I had the pleasure to listen to one of Mr. DeMott's lectures on astronomy. With the aid of his charts he made the whole subject so plain and clear that the child of eight years was, equally with the cultured adult, deeply interested and fully able to comprehend. I can conceive of no lecture that could more effectually bring conviction to the mind of every hearer of the conflict between scientific facts and the Mosaic account of creation, and yet without in any way arousing the prejudice of the most devout orthodox believer.

The organization at Hempstead is an assured success. The Executiv Committee are hopeful of inducing Mr. DeMott to deliver one of his lectures at the New York Freethinkers' Annual Convention. Nothing could better demonstrate the practicability of science schools on Sundays.

The effort of Mr. C. H. DeMott at Hempstead proves we should not wait for organization to germinate itself, but at once plant, foster, and cultivate it.

The Convention at White Sulphur Springs is especially designed to afford facilities for our best thinkers and workers to become personally acquainted and interested in each other, so they can compare methods and perfect plans for practical organization so that every school district in our state where there are five Liberals may hav its local Secular society and science school on Sundays, devoted to sociability and scientific education.

Never was there a more important meeting, or one of more interest. Recreation, sociability, and advancement of the cause combined render it a duty for every genuin Liberal to make especial effort to attend and induce friends and neighbors to accompany him. Call for the Tenth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Tenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held in New York city, at Chickering Hall, Fifth avenue and 18th street, on November 11th, 12th, and 13th, and also on Sunday evening, the 14th, a lecture by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which concludes the Congress.

Pursuant to a vote at the last Congress, notice is hereby given that the following amendments to the constitution of the Union will be acted upon: 1. To reduce the fee for life-membership from $25 to $10. 2. Or, on payment of $10 by applicant for membership, to authorize the secretary to issue ten-year membership certificates, with all the privileges of life-membership during that time. 3. Whenever a man or woman has taken out annual membership certificates for three or five consecutiv years, such person thereafter on payment of annual-membership fee to possess the privilege of life-membership.

The Congress will also be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute-books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the president and secretary and three delegates. All charter-members and life-members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executiv committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present.

Per order of board of directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
COURTLANDT PALMER, Treasurer.

News and Notes.

The two successful meetings at Denver giv me great encouragement. The large numbers present show the deep and wide interest that is felt in the Freethought movement, especially in the West. In fact, the Western states and territories afford a most promising field for effort. The people out here seem to be ready for work, and heartily believe in something new and better.

The Liberals of Denver are worthy of all credit for the splendid campaign they hav made. They went in for doing their level best, and achieving a result that would be felt far outside of Liberal circles. This they hav done. The Liberal party in Colorado has now a power that it never had before. There is better acquaintance, more unity and enthusiasm.

I enjoyed my visit in Denver exceedingly. It gave me fresh courage to be in contact with such brave campaigners, whose very boldness compelled victory to perch upon our banners.

I found a pleasant Freethought home with Mr. and Mrs. Truss and their little boy, a bright Liberal indeed, whose name is honorable, Charles Darwin—and that indicates what kind of a man he will be. He is born to all the glory of science and liberty.

Mr. Truss is full of the enthusiasm of humanity. He formerly lived in Syracuse, where he was identified with Liberal religious movements among the many reformers of that city, which is the "salt of the earth." His father was a Methodist minister, but with a dash of the liberty-loving spirit. He seceded from the great Methodist church because of its pro-slavery attitude, and was a leader in the formation of the American Wesleyan church, which was distinctivly antislavery, and was the only organized Christian body that set itself without compromise for the freedom of the slave. We see, therefore, that Mr. Truss has good blood from such heroic ancestors, and the material to make an advanced Freethinker. For some years he has been quite blind, but that only seems to make him more bright and activ. He is in thorough sympathy with the outward world. His mental vision pierces beyond the walls of flesh. I find him a scholar and a thinker indeed in regard to the great issues of the day. He has penetrated deep into the questions that now agitate the world. He still keeps the armor on, although many men in his circumstances would retire from the front of the battle. But he is bound to be with the advancing column. He is nobly aided by Mrs. Truss, who is one of those bright women who, in the world of practical activity, demonstrate that woman has just as much brain power and executiv capacity as the sharpest business man.

Mr. John G. Jenkins is a genuin English Secularist. He believes in doing something. He has a heart as big as an ox, with plenty of common sense to guide. He has faith in "social dynamics" and the power of Freethought to make this world better and happier. He has the religion of humanity and this world. He is perfectly courageous in the expression of his opinions. No man has done more for our cause in Denver than John G. Jenkins, and it was a pleasure to meet so genuin a man and his delightful family, whose home is indeed a temple of liberty, equality, and fraternity.

Mr. Walter Varian is another good English brother, who has roamed through various lands, and gathered all sorts of truth. He has now pitched his tent in Denver. It did my mind and body good to meet this genial traveler. He has charge of the Turkish and Russian baths of the Windsor Hotel, and these equal in comfort and magnificence anything we can boast of in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Hooper added also to the enjoyment of my pilgrimage, for they brought me into fresh contact with the great English world of agitation and politics. Mr. Hooper is brother-in-law of Mr. Bradlaugh; was with him in his boyhood, played with him, mingled with all his early difficulties and trials; and it was like a romance, the story told of those days of penury and toil, of nakedness, and almost hunger, whose persistent struggle has resulted in such splendid triumph.

Mr. Z. Shed is well known to many Freethinkers, especially in the West, for his able advocacy of our cause, both upon the platform and in the press. He formerly resided at Fremont, Neb., and was one of its foremost lawyers and business men. He organized the Freethought element there, with library, reading-room, and courses of lectures, and made it a predominant influence. He is now one of the prominent citizens of Denver, and an unflinching advocate of our cause. He recently issued a public challenge to Munhall, the evangelist, but that "champion of the Lord" was afraid, and answered not. Mr. Shed is author of several lectures and articles, which are freighted with facts and arguments, and will make excellent campaign documents. In the future Freethought movement of Colorado Mr. Shed, with his ability, energy, experience, and knowledge, and courageous loyalty, will be a skilful and enterprising leader. I enjoyed the hospitality of his beautiful home, where his wife, and son, and daughter make this world so really pleasant that faith in another is of but little account. We are satisfied where we are.

Mr. Charles Roth is another radical humanitarian who believes in work. He will not let the Christians be at peace. He likes to giv them a touch of the sword of truth now and then, although it does hurt the theological skin. The Christians squirm, of course, but in the end they feel better, for they attain some knowledge.

I spent an agreeable evening with Mrs. Taussig and her family, and Mr. and Mrs. Beekman, who are all ardent Freethinkers. Miss Florence Taussig added much to the interest and success of the lectures by the excellent music which she furnished. I know I spoke better because I had such happy inspirations.

Mrs. Buckner-Johnson the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know well. She has enriched our Freethought literature by her noble contributions. She has fought grandly for our cause in word and life with indomitable spirit and devotion. She has had to overcome great difficulties, and pass through great sorrows, but the glory has not gone from her mind and heart. Humanity is still fresh and beautiful, and truth sublimely joyous. She is "on the hights" because she has been true, not to God, but to herself. She has maintained her integrity—and what nobler victory can be achieved by man or woman?

I was glad also to meet my old friend the Rev. Myron Reed, who is by all odds the most brilliant and popular preacher in Denver. He has mighty little theology in him, however. He sticks to humanity, reform, and this world. He is no clergyman indeed, but a live man, and a first-class heretic. He and I were in the theological seminary together, and I always thought he was about the most sensible fellow in the whole outfit. He didn't look a bit like a theolog, and he doesn't look a bit now like a minister. He tells a good story on himself. He was up in Michigan hunting and fishing, and made the acquaintance of some goodly "sinners." He was preaching then in Indianapolis, and invited them to call upon him when they happened in that city. They did so, and inquired for a lawyer by the name of Reed. Nobody knew him. "What, Myron Reed?" "Ah, yes, Myron Reed! Oh, he is a preacher!" "What?" said they; "a preacher? Why, we thought he was a gentleman!" Good for Reed, but hard on the profession. Reed is doing glorious work where he is, but I believe he will do a bigger work in the future. He is too much of a giant to wear the dwarf's mantle much longer.

Mr. Thomas, who introduced me at my second lecture, is one of the brightest lawyers in Colorado. He has always been an outspoken Infidel. Two years ago he ran for Congress on the Democratic ticket. His opponent threatened to spring the "religious racket" on him, and denounce Mr. Thomas as an Infidel. "Do that," said Mr. Thomas, "and I will giv you one thousand dollars. I shall be certain of election then." His opponent didn't dare to do it, and any politician would be a fool in this country who would try to make such an issue in a political canvass.

Well, I could name many others, men and women good and true, in this beautiful city of Denver. Mr. and Mrs. Coplin, E. T. Weber, E. T. Gibson, Fred. Warren, Austin W. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis, etc., whose names are on the roll of honor, the list of contributors to the Campaign Fund. I must not forget Mr. J. C. Alexander, stage carpenter of Tabor's Grand Opera House, who always does things up in style, and made my surroundings for the lecture as pleasant as possible. He and his wife are both Liberals.

Only think of it, Mr. Richard Day, of Alamosa, came two hundred and fifty miles to hear my lecture. The Christians can't beat that. What one of them all will travel five hundred miles to hear an orthodox sermon? Not much. It don't pay to go so far merely to hav a sound nap under the droppings of the sanctuary. Our Day is a live day, indeed, and brings good cheer. That shows what Western folk will do, and the fire that is in their blood. So long as people come five hundred miles to hear me talk, I will keep on my way rejoicing. It makes up for a thousand disappointments to shake hands with so glorious an Infidel as Mr. Day.

On Monday evening, August 16th, there was an enthusiastic organization of the Denver Secular Union. It will be a splendid power for Liberalism, I know. A large number hav already united with it.

So good-bye, Denver; you hav given the noblest success of the whole campaign, and I thank you with all my heart. All along the line we shall feel the glow of your choice and noble spirits.

Again at Greeley, and two more lectures to good houses, and the organization of a Secular Union. This makes four new Secular Unions in Colorado at important points. What is wanted now is a first-rate lecturer for this "Centennial state." In combination with local talent, a vast work might be done. Who will make good this magnificent promis?

Captain Wadlia, J. W. Leighton, Dr. Camp, Dr. Welsh, and their families and others will make Greeley worthy of its name, a power for political liberty and justice. Whatever other organizations may do, our organization has a special work—a work of the first importance. Our friends at Greeley realize this, that while other Liberal societies can accomplish somewhat of our social and intellectual service, they cannot emphasize with the same tenacity the Nine Demands and strike the blow for political freedom. Our organization exists for a special purpose, and all Spiritualists, Materialists, Agnostics, Atheists, and broad-minded Unitarians can unite on this common platform and labor for a reform the success of which is absolutely necessary to the success of all other reforms.

I was glad to meet again our good friends Mr. and Mrs. Wadlia, Charles Berry, Mr. and Mrs. Leighton and family, Dr. Camp, Mrs. Stillwell, and others. I find that Dr. and Mrs. Camp hav had quite a varied experience in their battles for freedom. They lived in Georgia before the war, and were stanch advocates of the Union, and were compelled for safety to run the blockade and find a home in the North. The doctor was obliged to travel on foot several hundred miles amid the mountains of Tennessee, and burning forests by night, and it was indeed a wonderful and romantic experience. His wife and children were obliged to follow by a different route, and for several months the doctor knew not what their fate might be. At last they came together in New York. The doctor and Mrs. Camp were at that time Liberals, and endured sacrifices for opinion's sake. They hav brought up a good family of Freethinkers, and all his children—and grandchildren, too, I guess, one of whom, a bright baby, is named Robert Ingersoll—are enlisted for the war. This Camp is indeed a lively camp, but no "chaplains" need apply.

I was disappointed not to meet Mr. Gibbs, formerly minister of the Unitarian church here, but so radical that the conservativ element rebelled and demanded something more Christian, and the good-natured radicals and Agnostics consented. They thought the Unitarian church a good thing and were willing to endure prayers and Bible-reading for the sake of a little social life. Everyone must decide for himself, but my radicalism and the radicalism of some of my Greeley friends are too strong for that kind of food. I want the Unitarian church to do all the good it can, but from my standpoint it has altogether too much of "the sweet by-and-by."

Mr. Gibbs is too strong and honest a thinker to be in the Unitarian pulpit. While a clergyman, he gave one of the best and most cordial sermons on Ingersoll that I hav yet seen, and in it he sounds the notes of a genuin Infidel. He belongs to us, and will do noble work in the Secular movement.

I left Greeley last Thursday and bade farewell to the glorious mountains and vast plains, and am now in a world of enchantment, amid the rolling prairies covered with beautiful grass, waving ranks of corn, golden wheat, and shining orchards. It seems as if I had passed from one continent to another, all is so different. I almost imagin myself on the bosom of a wide and billowing sea, ornamented with ten thousand gleaming isles. I am at the farm-home, "Englewood," of Mr. Lewis Moffitt, the founder of Seward, one of the frontiersmen of this state who came to these prairies twenty years ago when there was not a house to be seen, and the Indians were almost within gun-shot. A vast change has taken place.

The whole country is now under cultivation. Seward is an elegant city. The farm buildings are like those of New England. All is animation, life, and splendor. I hav given three lectures here, to good houses, in spite of the hot weather. It seems as if, while I am writing this letter, I am seated right in front of a furnace. The sweat rolls off my face as if I were packing hay, as I used to when a boy under the barn roof. Scarcely a breath is now in the air. I lecture this evening on "The Glory of Infidelity." I am afraid the Christians won't come, the weather givs such premonitions of what might be if they should fall from grace. On a cooler day they might be more venturesome. The orthodox hav also imported, to offset my lectures, a temperance orator, "the Rough Diamond of Indiana." In spite of all, however, the work goes on. A Secular Union has been formed here. Friends are rallying. I will write more next week—if I am not melted. I go from here to Valley Falls to-morrow.

My lecture engagements are: Seneca, Kan., Aug. 29th; West Point, Neb., Sept. 1st, 2d, 3d; Omaha, Sept. 5th; Cromwell, Ia., Sept. 7th, 8th; Leon, Ia., Sept. 9th, 10th; Ottumwa, Ia., Sept. 12th; West Point, Ia., Sept. 14th, 15th, 16th; Chicago, Ill., Sept. 26th; Belding, Mich., Sept. 28th, 29th; West Union, O., Oct. 1st, 2d, 3d. I shall then return to New York to prepare for the national Congress to be held there Nov. 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th. This will probably be one of the most interesting Freethought gatherings ever held in the country, and I hope that Liberals from all parts of the land will arrange to come to the Empire City and enjoy a "feast of reason and flow of soul."

Chicago Secular Notes.

The Chicago Secular Union reopens Sunday evening, Sept. 19th. Judge Page, an eloquent speaker and scientist, lectures on "The Origin of Life."

Persons living at a distance from Chicago fail to realize the persecutions of the Liberals in this city at the present time. Last Sunday the Rev. Mr. Blackwell preached a sermon in one of our popular churches, in which he contended that every publisher, teacher, or lecturer of Atheism and Infidelity was equally responsible with these seven convicts of crime, and that "Anarchy is but fruit ripened upon the tree of Rationalism planted by George Frederick Hegel in Germany, and watered and cultivated by Robert Ingersoll in America."

The reverend gentleman but reflects in his charge the logic and the animus of the prosecution in the late Anarchist trial. These men were Atheists. Hang them! A lady prominently connected with the defense said to me that could the people of this country know and realize the travesty upon justice that was being enacted in Cook county criminal court they would rise in revolution; and said a prominent Chicago physician, himself orthodox, "A brother practitioner of mine admits that it has not been proved that these men were guilty, but they are Atheists and that should hang them."

You must not think that we hav made ourselvs particularly obnoxious to the authorities by any pronounced declarations of Anarchy; that isn't necessary in Chicago now to insure persecution. The mildest form of Socialism is as fiercely condemned, and no form of Freethought tolerated. Martyrdom is made extremely easy. A system of police espionage has been adopted rivaling the spies of Venice, and in torturing prisoners the methods of the Inquisition hav been revived. The bigotry, intolerance, and persecution of the Middle Ages confront us. On the streets citizens are shadowed, and detectivs are found at the meetings of every society. The Arbeiter Zeitung, Spies's paper, is permitted to publish only what a censor may approve. At a labor meeting Sunday afternoon, two policemen came to the door and ordered that no resolutions be passed censuring the action of the jury in condemning the Anarchists. But the command was not obeyed, and the society passed a vigorous resolution denouncing the injustice of the sentence.

It is proposed by Chicago's wealthy citizens to raise a purse of a thousand dollars, to be divided among the jury, offering a premium to the jurors that are to sit in judgment on the Anarchists yet to be tried. "I tell you," said Captain Shaack to a reporter, "the Anarchist business in Chicago has only commenced, and before it is through with we will hav them all in jail, hung, or driven out of the city." And remember that this includes all Socialists. The police of Chicago, with but few exceptions, are Catholics. This case, from the time that Captain Bonfield, unauthorized, as sworn to by Mayor Harrison—and so it goes down in history—led the attack on a peaceable meeting of citizens at the Haymarket, has been in the hands of the police. The witnesses for the state were detectivs, denominated by the Supreme Court of the state of Illinois as professional liars, paid informers, men who would swear to anything to save their lives; and the police. The Protestant ministers at a meeting resolved that they would approve whatever the police might do, thus using Catholic clubs to beat the citizens of a Protestant country. And now that sentence has been passed, the ministers of the city denounce the Freethinkers as the cause, and a daily paper says, approvingly, that "the Catholic clergy are not slow in expressing their entire satisfaction at the verdict."

And so Captain Schaack, as in "The Mikado," is lord high chancellor, and has only to consult himself as to the number and execution of his victims. Like Robespierre, who, entrusted with too much power, became the terror of the French Revolution, this man becomes each day more daring, and adds some citizen's name to his list.

The capitalistic press has howled its approval. Bismarck, through his agents, sent congratulations; but the people, the laborers, are appalled at the severity of the sentence, and, white with horror, huddled here and there in little groups on the corners, whisper one to another, "It can't be; they won't hang them, it is too cruel; for, after all, these men were only speaking for liberty and justice."

These men, says the Rev. Mr. Blackwell, threw no bombs, but their words incited some others to do the deed. These men hav been condemned to death as accessories, and the bomb-thrower, the principal in the crime, is unknown. By the enormity of this sentence all precedent has been set aside, for the law demands that the principal be known before another is punished as an accomplice. And, my fellow-Freethinkers, do not imagin that this trial and its results concern the Anarchists alone. It is a direct attack upon the rights of the people as represented by associations to enable labor to protect itself; upon free speech and a free press. Let every individual, then, boldly add his protest against the persecutions that are being cunningly manipulated by the Catholic and Protestant clergy of this country. Let the rulers feel that the people stand firm for justice as one man, a power behind the throne.

MRS. A. M. FREEMAN,
Secretary of Chicago Secular Union.

The Verdict.

If the article labeled in Chicago as "law and order" be universal, then American liberty is a hollow mockery and a stupendous lie. Eight men, indicted for murder, hav been tried for conspiracy, riot, Anarchism, Socialism, Communism, Atheism, and labor reform in general, and seven hav been sentenced to death for a murder that the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER or I is just as guilty of as those condemned. It is the verdict of a hired capitalistic vigilance committee, aided by the oath of a notorious professional blackmailer, thief, and scoundrel in general to giv it legal form. Their sentences astounded and horrified every person of heart and brain in this city. The capitalistic class, not satisfied with exulting over this infamous "attempt" at the sacrifice of seven human lives, openly offered a blood-money bribe to the jury of $1,000 so that any future juries who might serve on this and other cases (there are a number of others to be tried) will violate their oaths, fall at the feet of the Moloch, and receive their reward.

Oh, how well we remember the traditions of liberty as laid down by the founders of this republic! Think of it, the press of Chicago glory over the fact that the organs inspired by Bismarck, in Berlin, heartily approve of the verdict; that Americans now rejoice that their judicial proceedings are approved by the damnedest despotism of Europe. Of course they are approved—Bismarck rejoices, the czar of Russia is happy, the pope of Rome—the great conspirator—serenely chuckles, and every tyrant of great and small degree is pleased in proportion to his infamy.

Think how sacred is the freedom of the press when bullet-headed policemen are sent by a state's attorney to notify the Arbeiter Zeitung that if it passed severe adverse criticism on the verdict, the office would be gutted and the paper suppressed. By the advice of their attorneys much matter was eliminated.

At a meeting of the Central Labor Union, Sunday, detectivs came to the door, called out President Zeller, and demanded that no resolutions should be adopted which criticised this verdict or the judge or jury. To the honor and glory of this brave organization, they passed resolutions in spite of this intimidation. They are of the sterner stuff.

One of our most noted lawyers and citizens, an ex-judge, has just written me:

> I am opposed to judicial murder. . . . The right of free speech, free discussion, for the purposes of reform, is to be maintained at all and every cost. When it comes to police dictation as to what is proper or improper to be said, and discretionary arrests, by the police, for improper speech, we are on very dangerous ground, and every citizen should stand by the right of free speech and resist police dictation by every rightful means. Shall a Roman Catholic policeman, full of bad whisky and worse religion, decide what is incendiary language? Whenever it shall come to that, liberty itself is in danger, and every good man should be prepared to uphold the right of free speech.
> The conspiracy of Romanism in this country is its greatest danger. Romanism has policed every city and established a spy system more complete that ever existed in a state of war, through the confessional. Before this republic knows it, Romanism will be firmly clutching at its throat. Both parties are begging and fawning, lying and intriguing, for the Roman vote.
> The Protestant clergy are afraid to protest against the great conspiracy. The pope, and bishops of Rome and America, can in a word "absolve" every Roman Catholic citizen from his oath of allegiance to this country—his allegiance to Rome, the pope, being of superior binding force. There is ten thousand times more danger from Romanism than from Anarchism.

My correspondent, with whom I hav taken this liberty, is well known in literary life, and he expresses my sentiments better than I could myself on this Roman question. Is it not a little singular that since there has been a compact between Rome and Bismarck every leading Socialist, except two, who also represent the Liberal sentiment of Germany, is now in jail? Most, if not all, members of the Reichstag, hav heretofore enjoyed the right of immunity from arrest while members?

Now is the time for Liberals to work. Do not imagin that your conservatism on other questions will save you from the "deep damnation" yet to come. Be ready, and fight the fight of political liberty over again. E. A. STEVENS.

Another Kind of Baptism.

FRIEND MACDONALD: The cartoon, the "Three Kinds of Baptism," in the last TRUTH SEEKER, is both instructiv and amusing. But, my dear boy, there is still another kind of baptism, and if our Christian friends hav their will, this is the kind you will eventually encounter. They call it, in their pious vernacular, "the baptism of fire." PETER ECKLER.

Faith and Prayer.

While so much is being said for and against the efficacy of prayer, and it is so clearly shown through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER that Christians hav no, and that absolutely there is no, prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God, the inquiry comes how and why the truly faithful believer experiences so much delight in this exercise, and is so ready and anxious to testify that he knows by experience that such does exist. That there are many good, honest, intelligent people who take more delight in prayer and secret communing with their God than can be afforded them by all else, is unquestionable. We would neither impeach their testimony nor deprive them of their delightful state of mind. We believe them sincerely and truly honest with themselvs and all others, when they tell us that they know that there is a prayer-hearing God. And, further, there is no question that such people are truly happy in their faith, and that their faith controls, in many instances, their moral character. With all these thoughts and evidences before us, we are induced to present a few plain and common thoughts to show that Infidelity is not (as many of our Christian brothers suppose) denouncing all Christians as hypocrits, but shows that this faith in God is produced from natural causes; and that the elevation of their moral natures, the opening of their eyes to see themselvs as they are, the iniquity of their hearts, etc., which are alleged to be the workings of the holy spirit in answer to prayer, are in fact only the effect produced upon the mind through faith in a heart-searching God, which causes them to turn their minds and look within themselvs, which leads to a self-knowledge. There is not so much difference between the good and the bad as many suppose. All possess both good and bad emotions; in some, the good emotions predominate naturally. Such people, if Christians, will tell us that they hav no recollection of ever experiencing religion; they will tell us that they believe in God and Christ, Holy Ghost, and so forth, but they never hav any testimony to giv us of any positiv knowledge about either. They were born naturally good, with large veneration and benevolence; they join the church as soon as they are old enough to hear of the goodness and love of God. Such people we find always in the more liberal of the Christian churches; they are never Methodists, and are not in sympathy with revivals; they no more understand the direct agency of the Holy Ghost than does the moralist; they ever will refer us to the Bible as the only authority that even God exists; they would not be of any use at a class-meeting, because they hav never had any experience in striving with the Holy Ghost; they can see no harm in dancing, or other social pleasures, where immorality is not intended; they are among our best citizens, would make good Liberals, and therefore are entitled to our highest respect and regard as Christians.

On the other hand, a large proportion of mankind are controlled by evil emotions. Love of gain, approbation, pride, wit, women, and the gratification of appetite are perhaps the chief emotions controlling and guiding their every act; their mind is so absorbed in these various pursuits that any finer feelings and sympathy for others are seldom manifest. They become so constantly intent upon their favorit desire that their thoughts seldom or never are turned within themselvs to see their own selfishness and evil tendency. They are quick to see the failings of others, and perhaps among the first to condemn, which shows plainly that they possess a perfect knowledge and really a fine sense of justice and goodness, but evidently subservient to their blind selfishness.

There are many who hav for so many years ignored the promptings of their higher and nobler sense of right that they seem to hav never possessed any; yet, if they can be drawn away from their favorit pursuit (which perhaps is impossible), evidences of a perfect knowledge and appreciation, and pride in feeling conscious of more benevolent impulses, will lighten up their countenances and the heavy mist will disappear from before their character, which will shine forth to the surprise of themselvs as well as the beholder. With these suggestions we venture the assertion that few people are intentionally bad; that is to say, if they could be made to look within themselvs and study and learn their evil impulses and motivs as they appear to others, all the experiences of a converted Christian would be realized. That "the heart is deceitful above all things" would be as fully realized as with the shouting convert who testifies to the visitation of the holy spirit.

One desires to be good; he is resolved to forsake his evil ways, believing that true happiness is to be found in promoting and arousing those better and higher impulses of his nature which hav for so long been ignored and neglected. What is he to do? Study himself, and when he obtains self-knowledge and sees himself as he is, his surprise upon the discovery of his own rotten heart will cause him to delight in turning from his evil ways and feel his dependence and obligation to humanity.

It is to be urged by the church that, while self-knowledge is necessary, the first thing to do in order to obtain it is to pray to God, the "searcher of all hearts," that he will giv us a perfect knowledge of them. We answer that, while prayer to an imaginary God may be a very proper expedient for attaining self-knowledge, as the actual engagement of the mind in this exercise is in itself a great help to it, because the mind is in a better frame than when it is intently engaged in other pursuits; and while full faith in the existence of God and one's belief that that God knows the motiv of his mind and heart cause sincere honesty to prevail, which is all-essential to self-knowledge; yet the fact that people do attain to self-knowledge through and by prayer does not show to a thinking miud that God answers prayer or the presence of the Holy Ghost. It only shows that the mind has, by its application to prayer and existing faith in God, a searcher of hearts, been honest with itself, and while being honest has seen its own corruption.

Do you claim that we hav admitted at least some good in prayer to God? If we hav, we claim more benefit would derive from prayer to injured humanity. Instead of so much preaching about our duty to God, preach rather of man's duty to humanity. God needs nothing from us—he can take care of himself; but to he who has been robbed of his money and she who has been robbed of her virtue, to these should be offered your prayers for forgivness.

W. H. PENFIELD.

Is This a Free Country?

This question naturally arises when viewing the acts committed by the government officials during the last six months, in which time there hav been fined and imprisoned, under various specious pleadings, for expressing their opinions: Herr Most, convicted of "inciting to riot" in New York, where no riot has occurred; Hirth and his coadjutors, in this city now languishiug in prison for no other cause than that they were denouncing the dishonest injustice under which the people were being crushed. They claimed the money power owned and ran every department to the extent that no redress was possible through legislation. I did not then believe they were correct. It begins to look as though they might hav been.

They "incited to riot," while the only riot we had was the illegal and inhuman assault by the police and militia upon unarmed citizens, shooting down, among others, an old man feeding his chickens in his door-yard and a little boy on his way to school.

Our leading Knights of Labor were indicted at about the same time, and are awaiting trial, and were placed under $5,000 bail for "conspiracy" (boycotting), they having advised people not to buy a certain manufacturer's cigars, because he had broken faith with and discharged without cause four hundred Knights of Labor. Such a "conspiracy" was never entered into by the money and church power? Oh, no!

To-day comes the terrible news that the seven Anarchists (so-called) on trial at Chicago are sentenced to hang.

I cannot think one of those men on the jury believed these persons had any knowledge that a bomb was to be thrown on that fearful night. There was no evidence to show such to be the case; but they were Anarchists and the money power they were fighting demanded their blood. They were in a conspiracy to overthrow the government.

Jeff Davis, whose conspiracy cost the nation millions of lives and enslaved the masses for generations to pay the costs, can be banqueted and petted all over the country, but the men who dare defend the rights of the wage slaves of this country must expect to feel the halter draw.

I am too full of righteous indignation to find expression in words. There was no evidence showing that any one of these men was accessory to the crime. On the contrary, the testimony of the mayor of the city proved conclusivly that the police made an unwarranted attack upon a peaceable meeting of citizens when nearly at its close and already quietly dispersing.

These Anarchists may hav talked foolishly when they claimed that justice could only be brought about by force, but let me say that the way they and others hav been treated in the face of facts to the contrary is convincing many thinking people that their views are correct. The press of the country is the great molder of public sentiment, and, subsidized as it now is, it becomes the worst foe to justice. The great dailies of the great cities hav been persistent in misrepresenting in the grossest manner everything in connection with these various cases. They hav misrepresented evidence and lied outright, and thus hav misled honest people in regard to the facts.

I believe as at present conducted they are a curse to the country. Their functions are perverted, their powers prostituted to unholy purposes; and unless a more healthy action can be speedily secured the little liberty we now enjoy will soon be lost.

Talk of the right of free speech in this country! To be sure, the Constitution declares in its favor, but when people are arrested on all sorts of trumped-up charges to prevent its exercise, such as "inciting to riot," "conspiracy," "blasphemy," etc., and the press indorses and sustains it, we feel to exclaim with Dr. Holland:

Oh, giv us men! A time like this Demands great hearts, strong minds,
True faith, and ready hands;
Men whom the lust for office cannot kill;
Men whom the love of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who love honor; men who will not lie;
Men who will stand before a demagog
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking—
Strong men, sun-crowned, who liv above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking,
For while the rabble with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions and their little deeds,
Mingle in worldly strife, lo! Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justicc sleeps!

JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M.D.

Milwaukee, Aug. 21, 1886.

Powderly and Communism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Under the above heading, your correspondent "J. M." says some very flattering things of Mr. T. V. Powderly, grand head of the Knights of Labor. He, as the editor of a defunct Socialistic paper, claims to be an authority in discussing the platform and declaration of principles of the Knights of Labor (which principles—those they publish and preach, or those they practice?). Speaking of Powderly, he says: "His ship is stanch, his sails snugly furled, etc., and his pumps manned by strong arms. And don't you forget it."

After all the iconoclastic blows dealt the idols of "J. M." (Mr. Powderly and the Knights of Labor), it may seem cruel to add to them. Still, I desire to ask "J. M." if the action of the Knights of Labor in Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, New York, and the Gould Southwest system, where they resorted to intimidation, violence, forcible possession, yea, and to murder, were, under the circumstances, justifiable? Was their action that of men whose cause was just—that of men "whose ship is stanch, and commanded by a captain whose compass is perfect, and quadrant at all times reliable?" What must be the principles of an order that allows its members to strike because the corporations employing them do not, at their bidding, discharge non-members of their order, as was the case with the L. S. & M. S. switchmen at Chicago and numerous other cases? This is tyranny, and I had rather be the victim of the tyranny of capital than that of organized ignorance and demagogism.

Powderly boasted he would (unless Gould came to his terms in the Southwest troubles) order a universal boycott of Gould. How did he do it? By ordering a strike on the Third avenue street railroad, thereby swelling the earnings of Gould's elevated railroads. Has not the result proven that he is a vain boaster? He declared the Southwest strike uncalled for, "and unjustified, and wrong," yet he givs to it his official countenance and the support of the whole order.

If he has the power to order the course of his "huge craft," why not order it in a justifiable and right course? A man "whose compass was perfect" would steer in a right course.

On March 4th 4,700 men, without cause, and at the bidding of demagogs, stopped work on the Gould system. On May 6th they were ordered to return to work—the strike is over. Cruel mockery! The leaders knew there was no work for them (less than two hundred men were taken back), and such order meant a stoppage of the strike fund and starvation. They are, practically, tramps to-day! With the high-sounding oratory of their leaders they were enticed to their ruin. Some lost their lives, all their situations, that were to them and their families a living, and money—their hard-earned savings of years—that was invested in little homes, and are now outcasts and criminals.

Who can estimate the amount of destitution that exists now and is awaiting the thousands of workingmen and their families during the forthcoming winter? I shudder to think of it. Hundreds of workingmen hold Powderly and his satellites in a large measure responsible for such results.

"J. M." says, "Let the Knights of Labor beware of the Satanic press." Much as I favor free speech and free press, if there is any press more Satanic than a large portion of the so-called labor reform press (Knights of Labor) in this country, "I would honestly vote for its suppression as pernicious literature."

Again, "Let the Knights of Labor gain political ascendancy legitimately secured, and all disturbing issues in America, finding justice, will become harmless as Hybic bees" (rather as hyenas, judging from the acts of the L. S. & M. S. switchmen and numerous other cases).

They hav gained such ascendancy in the city the writer resides in. Results: municipal strife, a prodigal waste of the people's money, a stagnation of trade through the withdrawal of capital owing to the unsettled state of the labor market. Save us from such a state of chaos and desolation as the universal ascendancy of the Knights of Labor would bring about.

I am a railroad laborer, and hav been for twenty years prominently identified as a labor reformer, a member of a labor order, and a Freethinker. I hope you will publish this, as it voices the sentiments of hundreds of workingmen, many of whom are disgusted Knights of Labor. JUSTICE.

In the Streets.

(AFTER SHAKSPERE.)

A rogue! a rogue! I met a rogue i' the streets:
A scribbling rogue—a miserable world!
As I do liv by food, I met a rogue,
Who livs by lies and swings a golden pen,
And basks in Lady Fortune's smiles,
Piling up dimes—and yet a scurvy rogue.
"Good morrow, rogue," quoth I. "No, sir," quoth he;
"Call me not rogue till heaven hath made me poor."
And then he drew a telegram to view,
And, looking at it with exultant eye,
Says, very wisely, "This is good as cash.
By this men see," quoth he, "how wags the world.
'Tis but a minute since it came by wire,
And after one hour more 'twill be in print.
And so I furnish news to vulgar crowds,
And thus do make a goodly business for myself,
And thereby cram my purse." When I did hear
The scribbling rogue boast of his lying trade,
My nerves 'gan tingling and my teeth to grate,
And I did rail sans intermission,
Knowing his Tribune favored rich men's schemes
To rob poor labor of its hard-won dues.
Boss. What rogue is this?
Jack. An editorial rogue! One bred in college,
Where he was told, who would fair fortune find
Must use his gifts in favor of the rich,
For rich men are the favorits of heaven.
Who doth not so will find himself at death
Drier of dimes than the remaining biscuit
After a voyage. He manufactures speech
And observations, the which he prints as
"Latest news!" Oh, hang a scribbling rogue!
A rogue ambitious, with a golden pen!
Boss. The world needs scribes.
Jack. Most useful fellows, too.
Provided people weed their better judgment
Of all opinion, rogues can be relied on;
If not, not useful. Without a curb,
They take as large a charter as the wind,
Still gulling all they please: no man so good
To keep the scribbling, lying rogue at bay;
No name so pure but he would blow upon,
Rotting with maggot innuendoes
Fair reputations, under guise of news,
Heedless of wrong. And wherefore does he so?
The why is plain as way to Stock Exchange.
Few men would seek to call the rogue to task,
Preferring to keep silent though they smart,
Bearing the stinging venom of the bob.
The wise man's effort is anatomised
By the low cunning of the greedy rogue,
Filling his daily columns with mean hints,
And gilding them with sermons as offsets,
And labor notes recording bootless strikes.
Invest the rogue with pen, you giv him leave
To do his worst, and he will through and through Infect society discordantly,
To make his journal known and fill his purse.
Boss. Fie on thee! How would'st thou act as scribe?
Jack. What for a living would I do but good?
Boss. Perhaps most grievous wrong, in chiding wrong.
Who knows but thou through all thy chiding years
Hav wronged, not knowing it? For, to know wrong
Needs moral penetration infinit;
What man can comprehend life's ultimate?
Jack. Why, who cries out on wrong
That does not thereby seek impeaching wrong?
And wrong flows freely as the stretching sea.
Yet does the railer's railing go for naught.
What rogue within the city do I mean
When that I say, the scribe I met's a rogue,
Bearing the burden of a villain's shame?
Who will come in and say that I mean him?
When such a one's arraigned, it is his neighbor.
The rogue may be of basest function
Yet feel his roguery is nought to me
(Knowing that I mean him), and therein suits
His sinning to the mettle of my speech.
There then: How then? What then? Let me see wherein
He stands exonerated by his lacks.
And so rogues liv, careless as if they knew
My taxing them with wrong, like a wild goose, flies
Unclaimed of any man.
Boss. Your rogue but swells the burden of the world;
This wide and universal theater
Presents more woeful evidence of wrong
Than rogues with golden pens.
Jack. Then all the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players
Brief living, thinking, acting fantoccini,
Puppets replying to the yerk of string.
They hav their exits and their entrances,
While each one plays the role he's fitted for
By circumstances and the bond of build;
And thus the history: The infant,
Helpless within the nurse's arms, begins
To show the temper of the man to be;
Then, as a school-boy all his aims foreshadow
The special aptitudes of after life.
The educating process of the class-room
But givs keen edges to proclivities,
Not even biasing the primal structure.
If gentle, then a gentleman through life;
If coarse, a ruffian still, with but a veil
Veneering brutalism. Heredity
Takes precedence. The miser, ever hoarding,
Dragging lost pennies from the gutter;
The soldier, swearing, brandishing his sword;
The merchant, risking rough seas for sordid gains;
The legislator, framing slippery laws;
The lawyer, like spider, spinning webs round crime;
The priest, tricked out in full canonicals,
Twisting his text to bowstring Darwinism;
The actor on the mimic stage as king;
The judge in court bulldozing outraged strikers,
And praising brute men for swinging bloody clubs;
The wordy crank still harping on his theme;
The scribbling rogue who profits by them all;
With the poor supes of bummers and deadbeats
Thrown in to complicate humanity.
Still reeling on, each plays his cast-for part,
Until at last comes second childishness,
The voice quite changed to treble notes;
And so all parts are played. Each acter, at the last,
Shelving his usefulness in silent nooks,
Shuffles a-down the road to dusty death,
Dragging his weary burden toward the grave,
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.
Boss. I grant your predication quite correct,
There is no puzzle in your argument;
For why? All point to one great fact—
Our marriages are ill assorted.
But how, I ask, or what will rectify
The hindrance to such potencies of life?
Come, supple-witted railer, tell us that.

SONG.

I.

All, all, go in and win;
What! scared? there is no sin;
Mankind but dreams on earth.
Each one but plays a part;
Strive to improve in art,
Whate'er your role on earth.

II.

All the same in the end
How life you may spend;
One needs no prompter here.
As the leaves fall from flowers,
So do lives through the hours,
Passing from year to year.

Jack. A truce with all such songs! You do but lie;
Tuning your harp, not us, to discords.
In speaking as I do, I but make voice
'Gainst wrong; denouncing society
For usurpations that defame the bench,
The pulpit, and the school; framing young minds
To favor crime, in guise of virtue.
Earth is a planet plant, whose flower is Right,
Whose fruit is Justice. And so believing,
Sternly condemn we what would vitiate
The common mind; decrying trickery
And savage force, that make men snobs and slaves,
Giving false prestige to the millionaire
By beating poverty with bloody clubs,
Pointing to law and order in vindication.
Law and order! the shibboleth of rogues;
False, knavish, faithless, fraudulent!
A hissing and reproach, inviting hate;
A Roland for an Oliver. J. M.

"A Million for Missions!"

"A million for missions!"

Chaplain McCabe, of the Methodist church, is out with a demand for a million of dollars for missions.

The chaplain means business, too, and the Methodists of the United States hav got to walk up to the chaplain's office and settle or—well, I don't know the alternativ, but they hav got to settle, and will settle without standing on the order.

Chaplain McCabe is the Great North American Methodist Beggar. His racket is the missionary field. Let him run the missions, and he cares not who runs the pulpits.

This beggar-in-chief of the Methodist church is no cringing mendicant. He supplicates not but demands, à la Claude Duval. As with the latter it was "Stand and deliver!" so it is with the chaplain. As with the victims of the tax-gatherer of the road, so with the dupes of the tax-gatherer of the church—they stand and deliver at once, and make no protest.

"A million for missions!"

What a blood-sucker is the church! It is giv, giv, giv! more, more, more! if not, anathema! The poor fools can't face anathema, so giv of their own substance into the clutches of ravenous priests. How long, O Lord! O devil! will these cormorants of the church go about seeking whom they may pluck? As long as the fools last, of course.

"A million for missions!"

This is the cry of the Methodist Claude Duval, but it means a million during the coming year for the support of lazy, lying, libidinous, good-for-nothing-but-evil priests, of whom Downs, Nero, Bristor, Sherman, et al are shining exemplars. And the poor slaves of superstition hold up their hands while the Methodist Claude Duval goes through their pockets in pursuit of the million!

"A million for missions!"

It is given out that one-half of this sum is to be devoted to foreign, the other half to domestic, missions. Half a million of dollars to be devoted, ostensibly, to the conversion of a few negroes, Hindoos, and Mongolians from their own forms of superstitious worship to that effected by Christians, than which none other is more superstitious, but in reality to the support of McCabe, the members of the B. of F. M., and such shining religious exemplars as I hav named. A soft thing hav McCabe and the B. of F. M.

As to domestic missions, why is it that these proselyting teachers do not seek to convert the home contingent of heathens? There are millions of them here, and conversion, I think, should begin at home. Why go to the Congo and the Ganges to fish for heathens, when the latter abound all along the line of the East river and elsewhere in our own land? Why, because there is more money in the foreign than in the home fishery; and there is more joy in the missionary board over the receipt of half a million for foreign missions than there would be over a million for domestic missions.

And the beggar-in-chief of the Methodist church is now making the greatest effort of his life. And he will succeed, for the crop of fools filled with Bible religion is yet large, though yearly falling back before the advance of the rapidly augmenting hosts whose religion is the religion of humanity, and who believe that mankind should liv for mankind, and not for imaginary gods, of which there are as many as there are races of man and divisions of races, each a better god than the others, and "the only true god"—the "original Jacobs," so to speak. SI SLOKUM.

P.S.—I saw a suggestion in the World—by the way, the World is no slouch of a beggar; not to be compared with McCabe, of course, albeit not succeeding over and above well in raising funds for a golden ax for Gladstone, but grinding its own ax all the same—a suggestion to the effect that Colonel Ingersoll "hypnotize" Squire, and bring him to the plane of honesty and square dealing, which would be a good thing, and devoutly to be wished; but coupling this suggestion with another, to the effect that Squire in turn shall "hypnotize" the colonel, and bring him under the dominion of that old hag of superstition, the Christian religion, is carrying the thing too far, and is simply a diabolical suggestion. Happily, however, Squire can't thus "hypnotize" the colonel, and so no evil will come of it, but that doesn't alter the diabolical character of the suggestion. Squire "hypnotized" Ex-Mayor Edson, but it looks now as if his power to "hypnotize" is done for, as far as men and affairs in New York are concerned. That it is, let us pray. S. S.

Blasphemy Forty-Eight Years Ago.

From the Investigator of August 18th.

Yesterday (Aug. 17th) was the 48th anniversary of the release of our predecessor, Abner Kneeland, from the Leverett street jail, Boston, where he was imprisoned sixty days in the year 1838 for the alleged and imaginary crime of "blasphemy." We tell the story at every anniversary that the occurrence may never be forgotten, and for the information of those of our new readers who may not be acquainted with the cause of his persecution, prosecution, and imprisonment.

Mr. Kneeland, who was prominent as a Universalist preacher, was inquired of, when he became a Freethinker, to state wherein he differed from the Universalists' belief, and requested to giv his reasons in the Investigator. He frankly did so, and among his other statements he used the following language: "The Universalists believe in a God which I do not, but I believe that their God, with all his moral attributes (aside from nature itself), is only a chimera of their own imagination."

For publishing these words he was tried as a reputed blasphemer and Atheist. Mr. Kneeland, however, always said that he was a Pantheist; that his God was nature; and that he did not intend to deny God, absolutely, but only that he did not believe in the same kind of God that the Universalists did. Yet the court ruled that he denied "the God of the statute," and therefore was a blasphemer and an Atheist. He had four trials; on the first the jury disagreed, owing to the firmness and good sense of Col. Charles G. Greene, editor of the Democratic Morning Post of this city; and on the second trial Mr. Loring Dunbar had also the moral courage to disagree with the rest of the jury.

On the third trial Mr. Kneeland was convicted, and on appealing to a higher court the verdict was sustained, and he was sentenced to sixty days' imprisonment. He was very ably defended on the first trial by Andrew Dunlap, Esq., and on the subsequent trials Mr. Kneeland defended himself. But it all availed nothing; he had violated "the statute in such cases made and provided," and so, on the 17th of June, the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill, which was fought for liberty, Mr. Kneeland was imprisoned for taking the liberty to differ from the Universalists.

A petition for his release, signed by the Rev. Dr. Channing (Unitarian), and other Liberal-minded persons, was circulated, and also a remonstrance, signed by Samuel T. Armstrong (orthodox), and those of his religious opinions. Mr. Kneeland thanked his friends for interfering in his behalf, but added that as he had committed no crime he would not ask for a pardon. He served out his sentence, went to the West soon after, and died in Salubria, Iowa, in the year 1844.

Probably all the actors in the trials of Mr. Kneeland (with the exception of the veteran Colonel Greene) hav passed away. No other legal-religious persecution of the kind has happened, that we are aware of, since that notable event, and for the honor of Massachusetts may nothing like it ever happen in this state again. It was clearly a case of religious bigotry—that ugly spirit, which, commencing here with Puritanism, is alive yet; but among the brave Liberals who hav dared to oppose it we cherish with gratitude and respect the name and memory of that good man and true reformer, Abner Kneeland.

The State Convention.

Mr. Reynolds, who is on the ground, writes that there is every prospect of a large local attendance at the White Sulphur Springs Convention, and if the Freethinkers from abroad are as numerous as usual, the meeting will be a great success.

Mr. Reynolds has been studying railroad maps, and the result of his investigation is as follows: New Yorkers can take the boat to Troy, buying an excursion ticket, thence purchasing excursion ticket to Mechanicsville, thence by rail to Saratoga Lake, and across the lake to the grounds. Coming from Boston and intermediate stations, the Boston and Hoosac Tunnel road sell tickets for fare one way to those who ask for Freethinkers' return ticket. Eastern people should also buy tickets to Troy, thence via Mechanicsville to Saratoga Lake, and up the lake to the grounds. From Troy to the grounds is only a little way. Residents of Troy can make the round trip for $1.63. Visitors should hav their mail addressed in care of T. Luther, box 744, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

In addition to the subjects of the orators announced previously, Mr. J. J. McCabe will lecture of "Man," T. B. Wakeman upon "The Present Need of Constructiv Liberalism," and L. K. Washburn upon the "Coming Religious Conflict." The contributions for expenses thus far amount to $153.50. Once more everybody is asked to come and bring their friends.

More Religious Persecution in New Jersey.

Ocean Grove, N. J., furnishes us another Christian outrage upon justice and humanity. About June last a Hindoo called S. Govinda Row Sattay arrived in Asbury Park, N. J., in search of work. He was very intelligent, spoke English well, and soon became popular and made many friends. Public interest in him led to his lecturing in hotel parlors to small audiences upon Hindoo topics, and these finally became dissertations and discussions upon the difference between Hindoo and Christian faiths.

Dr. Stokes, president of the Ocean Grove Camp-Meeting Association, sought to convert the Hindoo to Christian belief. Finding him too firm in his own faith, the doctor was unwilling to hav him remain at the meeting as a standing evidence of the futility of Christian missionary efforts. The cry of "a million for missions," which is the Methodist watchword just now, would prove ineffectiv, it was feared. If a whole Christian camp-meeting could not convert one Hindoo twelve thousand miles away from home, what damaging inferences might not skeptic logic draw?

In some of his remarks, Sattay told his hearers that Christian missionary efforts in India were a failure, and, as he admits, denounced some of the doings of missionaries in India. To Methodist official ears this was worse than blasphemy, especially as the people evidently were inclined to credit the Hindoo's words. Something had to be done to stop him.

On August 18th, a police officer took Sattay to Asbury Park, and warned him never to enter Ocean Grove again. This was by Dr. Stokes's orders. But Sattay, believing himself not in fault, on the following day attended services in the auditorium at Ocean Grove. He himself tells what follows, and his story is confirmed by the papers, given below:

"While I was sitting quietly reading the daily paper, a corporal came to me and said that the chief police officer wanted to see me. I followed him and found that there were only three of us. The warrant was read to me and then the depositions of the witnesses, which were kept ready written, were also read, and immediately the commitment was written and handed over to the corporal. I was at once put into a stage and taken to the railroad depot. I did not resist any procedure, and therefore I was not handcuffed. We got in the train and were at Freehold at 5 P.M. I was put in the jail."

The commitment was upon the testimony of Wistar H. Stokes and Titian P. Summers, and also upon what the police justice professes to hav seen himself.

"Wistar H. Stokes, of Ocean Grove, New Jersey, being sworn, says that he is a police officer in Ocean Grove, employed by the Ocean Grove Camp-Meeting association, and that in relation to one Hines, a Hindoo, he has repeatedly requested said Hines to desist in attracting crowds and has dispersed said crowds at different times; and that the said Hines has insisted upon collecting crowds of people and in this disturbing the peace of the place, and thus interfering with the carrying on of the religious services at the places appointed for such services.

"And that the said Hines has repeatedly returned to and around the said place of meetings, and by his gestures and language collected crowds about him as high as 150, and in this has been disorderly. Wistar H. Stokes.

"Affirmed to and subscribed before me this 19th day of August, 1886. Jno. C. Patterson, Police Justice Ocean Grove."

"Titian P. Summers, of Ocean Grove, New Jersey, being sworn, says that he is a peace officer in Ocean Grove, employed by the Ocean Grove Camp-meeting Association.

"And that he knows one Hines, a Hindoo called S. Govinda Row Sattay; that he requested the said Hines to desist from collecting a crowd on the sidewalks in and around the grounds of the Ocean Grove Camp-meeting Association. And that he did remove the said Hines from different places where he the said Hines had by his harangs called together a crowd while the meeting at auditorium was in progress, in this disturbing the peace. That the said Hines said to him he was doing it for money or for pay. And further that the said Hines has by thus collecting crowds in and around the said meetings disturbed the peace of the place.

"Titian P. Summers.

"Sworn and subscribed to before me, police justice of Ocean Grove, this Aug. 18, 1886.

"Jno. C. Patterson, Police Justice."

The above affidavits are made under a statute found in the Revision of New Jersey Laws at page 305, authorizing summary conviction before a police justice for disorderly conduct by a person intoxicated. They do not allege intoxication, however, nor is there any evidence of disorderly conduct given.

The justice evidently felt the weakness of the testimony and knew the illegality of his position, for he attempts to obtain ground for his commitment in a chapter of the "Vice and Immorality Act," at pages 1227–1229 of the same Revision. This act allows a justice, from his own view of the occurrence, to cause the arrest and punishment of a person who shall collect a crowd in the vicinity of places where religious meetings are being held.

The following is the police justice's return of the testimony of Sattay:

"Hine, a Hindoo called S. Govinda Row Sattay, upon examination before me, John C. Patterson, police justice of Ocean Grove, upon the charge of collecting crowds upon the sidewalks and grounds of Ocean Grove, and this during the meetings or religious service now held at Ocean Grove, New Jersey. And upon questioning him, he said that he did not believe but what he could do as he pleased, and that he could talk or hav crowds assemble to listen to him, and that he did not disturb the peace.

"Monmouth county: ss.

"That one Hine, a Hindoo, or, as called, S. Govinda Row Sattay, from my own view, did disturb the peace of Ocean Grove at divers times, but more especially on the 18th of August, in that he did on the grounds of Ocean Grove cause a crowd to assemble after being told by an officer that he should not do so.

"That he refused to obey the officers in their requests, thus becoming a disorderly person.

"From my own view, and the testimony of two witnesses, I do adjudge him to be guilty of being disorderly; and for said offense I do adjudge that the said Hine, a Hindoo, be confined in the county jail at Freehold for thirty days at hard labor from the date hereof.

"In witness whereof I hav hereunto set my hand and seal this day of August, A.D. 1886.

"John C. Patterson, Police Justice."

That Sattay was not awarded a hearing in the matter is shown by his written statement, made after conviction, and it is confirmed by many persons at Asbury Park and Ocean Grove. He says:

"While in Ocean Grove I hav always attended almost every religious meeting, and hav never disturbed religious services. Generally after the services were over, when I used to stand awhile outside the church premises, my Hindoo dress naturally attracted the attention of some kind and charitably disposed ladies and gentlemen; and they always used to ask me my whereabouts and my beliefs. Certainly I had to answer their questions, and when my answers seemed to be quite different from their beliefs, their questions increased as the crowd gathered round also increased. Thus there was always a short discussion after the services were over, and never during or before, and it was always outside the premises of the church buildings. Dr. Stokes did not like to see these gatherings and several times ordered the people to disperse; but when he saw that he could not compel them to disperse, he came to me and pulled me out of the crowd by my arm and I always calmly walked away. Such scenes excited the sympathy of the people the more, and they almost every day used to gather round me after the services were over."

On his arrival at the jail, fortunately Sattay found a friend in Warden C. A. Little. Mr. Little, who is a liberal and exceedingly kind-hearted man, had heard Sattay lecture and had become interested in him. He at once, at his own expense, employed legal aid for the helpless Hindoo. Mr. E. A. Arrowsmith, a resident attorney of Freehold, at Mr. Little's request, took hold of the matter, and, finding that the proper papers had not been filed in the county clerk's office, at once obtained an order releasing Sattay. Judge Parker, the supreme court justice who made the order, is ex-governor of the state, and his prompt righting of the wrong, with the action of Messrs. Little and Arrowsmith, shines brightly in contrast with the illiberal action of the other Jersey authorities.

The sentence imposed was the full limit allowed by the law, and fully evinces the malicious spirit which appears throughout the prosecution.

On his release, the Hindoo was supplied by Mr. Little with money, and he returned to Asbury Park. But the hand and voice of bitter religious prejudice are now raised against him. "The papers," he says, "said that I was blasphemous, and now people point their fingers at me, and my business is ruined. I was not blasphemous. I only told people about my religion and they seemed interested."

Sattay has been in this country about a year and a half. He is a nativ of Shelapore, where he received a good English education. His wife and all his relativs dying, he left his only child, a boy, in Shelapore, and came to this country to try and make a home for him. Sattay went to New Orleans, where he was employed in a sash factory. The factory was destroyed by fire last June, and finding nothing to do he came North and went to Asbury Park, hoping to find employment. In spite of his unpleasant experience Sattay believes the people of this country are generous, and that he can manage to make a home in America for his boy in India.

The Church and the Knights.

We hav had considerable to say about the connection of the Knights of Labor with the Roman Catholic church, a connection formed by the subserviency of General Master Workman Powderly to the bishops of the latter organization. The control of the Knights by the church cannot but be fatal to the real interests of the laborers of the country, since Roman Catholicism never advanced the welfare of the people without strengthening its own control of them. Mr. Powderly, it is now well known, regards the church as of greater authority with himself than the organization he manages. Some doubt, however, has been expressed whether the rank and file of the order would choose the church in preference to the assembly. But if all the members are like the Knights of Philadelphia, the doubt is soon settled.

An Associated Press dispatch, dated August 22d, relates that at a meeting to organize the cooks, servants, and waiters into an assembly of the Knights of Labor the action of the archbishop of Quebec was referred to by the speaker as follows: "I am an honest workingman, and I do not think such a thing is proper when we are struggling for an existence. I am, and always hav been, a good Catholic, but I am not afraid of the holy father in Rome. My duty is to keep the bodies of myself and family going." This declaration of independence was received much as George III. heard that of the "free and independent states of America." A woman in the audience was the first to resent it. She arose and moved toward the door, saying: "I would not forsake my father for the whole world, and I shall not stay here to be insulted." Others in the audience arose and followed the woman. Mr. McNeil, a member of Assembly No. 64, strode up the center aisle and said with much indignation: "I am a Knight of Labor, and I claim the right to object to what this man says, for it is not only an outrage upon the Catholic faith, but upon the noble order." The organizer replied that he was addressing a public meeting, and had a right to say what he pleased. Another Knight came up from a rear seat and said: "I don't care a damn whether it is a public meeting or not. This is a Knights of Labor hall, and it shall not be disgraced in this manner while I am here, and I will see to it that it will not be disgraced by you hereafter. Next Sunday you will find its doors closed against you." The meeting was then adjourned by the organizer, but the "insulted" Catholics remained a long time to discuss the remark of the speaker, and denounce him as an enemy of the "holy father" and true religion.

Of course, one swallow does not make a summer, and it does not follow that all Knights are of the same way of thinking as the Philadelphia Knights. But the indications are that a good percentage of them will choose the church and slavery to the Knights and such industrial freedom as organization and unity can secure. The prediction safe to make, therefore, is that the Roman Catholic church will control the Knights of Labor or break up their organization.

The First-page Picture.

And it came to pass in these days that a gentile named Reynolds went to sojourn among the heathen in the land of Jersey, and he pitched his tent at a place called Boonton.

And seeing the forlorn state of the swine which wallowed in the church mire roundabout, the good man was moved to take compassion on them, thinking that peradventure they would partake of his bounty and be made whole.

Therefore he began to scatter golden grains of reason among them, and lifted up his voice and spake unto them, saying, Why root ye? Know ye not that ye are afflicted with popish scurvy and Methodist mange? Verily I say unto you, ye are fed on slop and swill, and wallow in the mire that your masters may liv on you and wax fat.

And he made merry and laughed at them for their foolishness in doing these things, whereupon all the elders and valiant among the swine marveled much and were angered against the man and began to grunt in their own tongue among themselvs, saying: What manner of man is this that dareth thus to make sport of our holy things, even concerning the garbage of our tabernacles? Hath not this slop been our portion ever since the day when the master gave us the devils for an inheritance? Verily, he blasphemeth; away with him!

And they waxed exceedingly wroth, and compassed him about and wrecked his tent and pressed sorely upon him, and dragged him before their magistrate Van Orden, surnamed Old Tootyache, who sat in judgment over the man, and scoffed him, and persecuted him, and robbed him of his shekels until he was fain to get him thence.

And the rest of the acts which Reynolds did, are they not found written in the Book of Indictments?

The Real Traitors.

The God-in-the-Constitution party held a convention at Saratoga last month which was well attended and markedly enthusiastic and vigorous. The sole reason for the existence of this party is to extend the Christian features of our government, and particularly to put the names of God and Christ into the Constitution. At the Saratoga convention addresses were made by Miss Frances E. Willard, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and other theologico-political workers. Jo Cook wrote his sympathy with the movement, and Daniel Webster was eulogized to the skies for his erroneous declaration, in the Girard will case, that Christianity was a part of the common law of the land.

It is commonly accepted as an American principle that government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. But our Christian oppressors hold that government derives its powers from "God," an extraneous personage having no property or voting interest in this world, and consequently no sympathy with the people of the United States. Christ, another superfluous office-holder, they claim is the rightful king of nations. The assumption made by the Christians for these two alleged beings does not, however, in our opinion, entitle them to rule the United States. The true meaning of the National Reform people is, as we hav before pointed out, that the earth and the fulness thereof belongs to the Lord and his saints, and that the Christians, being the saints, desire to enter at once into possession. This is something that is not at all likely to come to pass so long as a reasonable degree of vigilance is exercised, but that the Christians are becoming more and more aggressiv, and determined to hav the earth, is plainly to be seen. They are seeking to hand this government over to a foreign power, for themselvs to run, and no one can doubt the substantial benefits that would inure to the church should they succeed. Our children would be taught to reverence this foreign power above the people's chosen officials; they would learn in school a system of religion that is false; free speech would be a thing of the past, and every citizen would be compelled to pay taxes to support the worship of this foreign power, and for the maintenance of his ministers. The God-in-the-Constitution party, therefore, is preaching treason.

It may be cruel to suggest such a thing, but how would it work to get the officers of the National Reform Association to hold a convention in Chicago, where they could be indicted and tried for their incendiary language? No doubt a jury could be found which would convict them of murder, and they might expiate their offense upon the gallows. They and the Anarchists are in the same boat.

Editorial Notes.

THE kind of Christians that grow in New Jersey may be guessed from the following paragraph in the Jerseyman: "A church within six miles of Whippany has for eleven weeks past paid their pastor, who has a wife to support, the handsome salary of $1.50 per week."

THE Jednota Osvojenych is a Liberal Sunday paper published at Cleveland, O., by V. Snajor. The following letter from Mr. Snajor explains itself.

"CLEVELAND, O., Aug. 23, 1886.

"DEAR SIR: One Bohemian reader of my papers sends to Mr. Reynolds, for defraying the expenses caused by his arrest in Boonton, N. J., $1. I published the account of Mr. Reynolds's arrest in my last issue, and asked those of my readers who could spare a few dollars to help that gentleman in fighting those Boonton antediluvian bigots. Respectfully, V. SNAJOR."

WRITING to Mr. Walser, in relation to the late unpleasantness at Liberal, T. M. Horne says:

"I was a little surprised to see Macdonald straddle the issue the way he did."

Mr. Horne labors under a misapprehension. We straddled no issue; the case was plain enough. If a mob had ordered any one to leave the town, or had fired shots at anyone's house because of certain opinions held by that person, then the mob was wrong—infamously wrong. We never believed that Mr. Walser instigated any such proceeding, and said so. We hav printed all the available evidence in the case, and leave our readers to draw their own conclusion. We never straddle an issue, though always suspending judgment till the evidence is conclusiv.

THE Independent rises to defend Martin Luther from the charge that he was the author of the German couplet:

"Wer liebt nicht Weib, Wein, und Gesang,
Der bliebt ein Narr sein Leben lang"
(Who loves not women, wine, and song, Remains a fool his whole life long.)

The Independent says it was cited by a German from a book published in 1494, and concludes that it was common as a drinking song long before Luther. Possibly our contemporary is right, but is it not possible that Luther put the couplet into its present shape, though the sentiment was expressed before he began to appreciate it? Luther was a roistering German monk, and fully enjoyed the dissipation implied in the first line of the couplet. And the church should not object, for she is indebted to German drinking songs for some of her best tunes. The air of "Old Hundred" was sung by lusty Germans long before it rendered tolerable the foolish words now set to it.

THIS is the way Saladin, of the London Secular Review, views the town and the people of Boonton: "Boonton, New Jersey, has covered itself with shame by mobbing C. B. Reynolds, one of the most clever and adventurous of America's Freethought lecturers, and by overthrowing and ruining the large tent which Mr. Reynolds carried along in his travels, that he might be independent of Christian caprice and extortion as far as the hiring of halls was concerned. Mr. Reynolds has, further, been arrested on the charge of blasphemy and arraigned before a J. P., a dunderheaded Dutchman of the name of Van Orden, who has succeeded in making an ass of himself, and who seems to possess just about the quantity of brains which usually falls to the lot of a Swedish turnip. A sturdy Freethinker of the name of Maxfield has found bail for Mr. Reynolds to the amount of $400, and our friend, Mr. Macdonald, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has come forward like a man to stand by this latest victim of Christian brutality. The case now goes to Morristown, the county seat, and we shall look forward to the trial of Mr. Reynolds with deep sympathy not unmixed with anxiety."

WE can sometimes extract comfort for the truth from the fears of its enemies. The Rev. H. D. Jenkins, D.D., writing in the Christian at Work, quotes the paragraph recently circulated—with many exclamations against its impiety by the religious press—about the council of Paris having condemned a school-book because it recognized "God," and tells this story:

"As I sat lately in the study of a friend, a college president who, for more than a quarter of a century, has worthily presided over a Christian college, my eye happened to fall upon his little work regarding political economy. 'Yes,' said he, alluding to it, 'it was prepared for use in high schools and academies; to giv the outlines of the science to that great multitude of youth who never enter any higher institution of learning. I sent it the other day to one of our state superintendents of education. But it was returned to me, with the note that its first sentence condemned it for use in public schools. I opened the book, and its first sentence was: "The source of all wealth is the beneficence of God." That is the very sentiment which the council of education struck out of the books to be used in Paris public schools; but the same thing had been done in America before. And it is being done every day in these states, founded in the prayers and self-sacrifices of a Christian people. But he whose blood stirs at these things is branded as "an enemy of our grand public-schools."'"

The ink from Mr. Jenkins's pen flows fast and furious at this rejection by a superintendent of education of his beloved belief, and he inveighs against our public-school system as being Atheistic, and avows his preference for Roman Catholic schools to the present ones. "I am as willing," he says, "to pay a Romanist for teaching geometry as to pay an Infidel. The danger of this country is not superstition, but Atheism; and our school-books are already Agnostic." We sincerely wish that this were true, but it is not. The school-books in most districts are distinctivly Christian. "'Tis true, 'tis pity; and pity 'tis 'tis true."

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG is now delivering eight lectures a week in Minnesota. He goes from there to Wisconsin, and will close his campaign in the Northwest, with a month's work in Iowa.

THE Black Hawk, Col., Times says of the secretary of the American Secular Union: "Samuel P. Putnam has been entertaining our people this week with a course of lectures treating of Freethought. His subject Tuesday evening was 'Universal Mental Liberty,' and was treated in a highly pleasing manner to all who were in sympathy with this style of lectures. Wednesday and Friday evenings his subjects were 'Glory of Infidelity' and 'New Heaven and Earth.' The seating capacity of the P. O. S. of A. Hall Friday evening was inadequate to accommodate the audience. The lecturer during his stay showed himself to be a man of extraordinary ability, holding his audiences continually wrapped up in his subjects."

CHAS. WATTS and his wife reached New York on the 27th ult., by the steamer America, and left immediately for Toronto, where he began his lecture tour last Sunday. He visited Hamilton, Ont., the 6th and 7th, and will endeavor to get back to White Sulphur Springs by the 10th. September 12th and 19th his engagements are for Philadelphia; September 23d to 27th, at Waynesburg and Pittsburgh; September 29th to October 6th, at Grand Rapids, Mich.; October 10th to 14th, Chicago and Wyoming, Ill. Applications for lectures should be addressed to 82 Berkely street, Toronto. Mr. Watts desires his friends to communicate with him at an early date, that his route may be laid out through the states with due regard to economy in railway fares.

W. F. JAMIESON writes: "In Merrillan we held our meetings at the base-ball grounds, where seats, in ampitheater style, were convenient for the audience. Gave four lectures. The last one, on Sunday evening, was more largely attended than any of the others. The church was but a few rods distant, and at the conclusion of their services the minister, his wife, and a goodly portion of the congregation came over and respectfully listened. One pious sister, however, wa not quite so respectful. Said she: 'Won't somebody put a corn-cob down that man's throat?—disturbing people in their worship!' Whereat the saints laughed. Well, that is not as bad an experience as Brother Reynolds is having in New Jersey. It will take the Christians a long time to learn that they do not own the United States. In Merrillan there are a few outspoken Freethinkers, such as M. Martins, H. O. Syvertson, F. H. Pulling, Dr. Hamilton, Mr. Heath, George Whitney, and a few others. The Christian church is very weak in this town. Many of the business men are, at heart, in sympathy with our movement, but lack the courage of their convictions—and it would not take a thimbleful of courage, either, in a place where Christianity is at such a low ebb. This is the town where, when I was introduced to a clergyman some three years ago, in the street, he had the bad taste to make a loud attack on my Infidelity, merely because my friend, Mr. Martins, who introduced me, politely invited him to come and hear me, and debate, if he chose. This seemed to anger the servant of the Lord, and he was not backward in telling me what a miserable, wicked thing Infidelity is. I was willing to be instructed by a gentleman who knew so much. While engaged in asking my clerical friend all about the wicked points of Infidelity, so that, knowing, I might shun them, a large crowd gathered and were highly intructed. A friend of the preacher came and led him away at last. I never seek strect controversies, but when a preacher presumes on his prerogativs I feel that it is my duty to stand my ground. A sad fate befel that servant of the most high. Seized with the usual clerical distemper. Deposed. Merrillan would be a stronghold of Freethought if there were not so many Gallios there—men who 'cared for none of those things.' What they are afraid of is hard for a sinner to see. H. O. Syvertson is the Freethought Socrates of this part of Wisconsin. He lately married an estimable lady of Black River Falls, Miss Julia Spencer. I was their guest during my stay. Augusta was next visited and three lectures given. The notice was short, the weather warm, and the people pious. Cannot say as much for our lecture-course here as in Merrillan, Neillsville, and Maple Works. Mr. Silas Perry is a stanch Freethinker, and did his best. The proprietor of the opera house, Mr. Russell, is a fair and pleasant gentleman to deal with, and very generous. He has a neat and commodious hall. Later in the season, when the farmers can attend, a good interest in Liberalism can be aroused there. Brother Remsburg was announced for early dates of September. Am now taking a few days' rest at home, in Lake City, Minn., previous to my Montana journey. I may be addressed, until further notice, at Butte, Montana territory."

Letters from Friends.

ST. CHARLES, MICH., Aug. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The pictures are just splendid. I think Heston missed it a little in showing Adam and Eve at their first meeting. They should hav been naked and not hav been clothed until after they had partaken of the fruit. But it is good as it is. Let Heston continue the good work. I am sorry that my old friend and neighbor, Jonathan Weaver, of Angola, took a dislike to the pictures. At first I thought they told too much, but now they are the first thing I look for. MILO MINER.

DAYTON, O., Aug. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: By all means keep up the cuts. I send out all my old papers among friends, and know of good results from the pictures alone. I hate to part with THE TRUTH SEEKER, on account of the pictures, and hope at the end of each year to get a book of them. I am away so much of my time it does seem as if I never would get to read your paper, but after business I devote all spare time to reading the papers and get through them, and they are one hundred cents on the dollar every time. GEORGE E. BLAINE.

DIGHTON, MASS., Aug. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Will you allow me space for a few words of commendation of Miss Wixon's "Story Hour?" It is a book that grown-up children will find interesting, as well as those of tenderer years. The sketches, stories, and poems are well written, sprightly, and entertaining. Some of them are amusing, and a few are pathetic; but they are all pervaded by a cheery spirit of encouragement which shows that their author is an optimist, as all writers for children ought to be. A young lady told me the other day that she had read it through three times for her little niece, who, when she is sick and has to stay in the house, makes her aunt read the "Story Hour" to her. It is to be hoped that the gifted author will find time to publish more books as interesting and healthy-toned. G. A. SHOVE.

ROCKPORT, MO., Aug. 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 14th is at hand, and the cartoon of "Adventures of Adam" I think is the boss. I wonder if they did really hear the voice of the Lord God walk. Who ever heard a voice walk? But enough on that subject.

I see J. F. Beck, of West Union, O., claims that he is not J. F. Beck at both ends of the line, i. e., in Ohio and Montana. He winds up his communications by calling on the other Liberal Becks that happen to liv on this planet to come to the front. Well, here we come. I was at the front at the time that D. M. Bennett was sent to prison, and circulated a petition for his release to present to President Hayes; and I expect if Brother F. J. or J. F. will make sufficient inquiry he will find the majority of Becks are Liberals. Wishing Liberalism and the Becks unbounded success, I am

Yours truly, G. G. BEOK.

INGALLS, KAN., Aug. 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished reading "Social Wealth," by J. K. Ingalls, and "Rational Communism." They are both grand. Freethought is on the gain here. A theological college that was started in Lincoln Center, our county seat. some four years ago, got above ground and stood till this spring. It has moved along slowly, and now its managers seem to be locked horns with the devil and don't know what to do. We are to hav a library in our school district soon, as we hav voted a district tax. The books will consist of histories, travels, biographies, and works of science, and you can rest assured that some of Brother Bennett's books will adorn its shelves, and I expect to see his portrait, with that of Paine and of Ingersoll, on its walls; and then if we can put in an organ and put up a few of the TRUTH SEEKER mottoes we can feel as though we hav done something for Freethought. A. BUTTERFIELD.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., Aug. 15, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Brother C. B. Reynolds paid us a visit Sunday, Aug. 8th, and gave us a very interesting lecture. His subject was, "The Bible—Whence it Came and What it Teaches." There were not less than one hundred people present, and out of nine sky-pilots who suck the blood of the dupes in this place, not one had the stamina to show himself and answer such questions as might be asked of him according to the faith that is in him. But, nevertheless, Brother Reynolds put the thinking-cap on a large number of those present, and quite a few bought pamphlets, and a good many hav expressed their intention of attending the Convention. Hoping you will aid us by your prayers in bursting the shackles that bind our villagers to superstition, bigotry, and priestcraft, we are as ever, yours for the cause we love,

WM. AND HARRIET THORPE.

CENTRAL CITY, NEB., Aug. 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: That indefatigable advocate of Freethought, John E. Remsburg, closed last evening in this city a course of three lectures with grand success. On the first evening his subject was "The Apostle of Liberty," which was attended by a fair, but appreciativ, audience. The second lecture, Sunday, 10:30 A.M., subject, "False Claims," was also fairly attended, but, owing to the extreme heat, few ladies came. In this lecture Mr. Remsburg has shown how to capture and interest an audience. It was crowned by a roaring applause. The third and last lecture, in the evening of the same day, subject, "Sabbath Breaking," was a masterpiece of mental labor and the acme of perfection. This lecture was visited by our city mayor and wife, county and city officials, doctors, lawyers, and the most prominent citizens of this town with their wives and daughters; but not one minister of the gospel had backbone enough to face the truth. I respectfully urge our Liberal friends to make arrangements with Mr. Remsburg for lectures, which they never will regret. He is the Ingersoll of the West, a title which he really deserves. Mr. Remsburg left this morning for Crab Orchard, where he will lecture, taking with him the best wishes of the many friends he made here during his stay. A. S. BLEYER.

BARRIE, KAN., Aug. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The Barrie Secular Society held its annual excursion on Saturday last, the 7th inst., on Kempenfeldt Bay and Lake Simcoe, under the careful management of Mr. D. C. Campbell, a prominent worker and faithful advocate of our great cause. The affair throughout was one of great pleasure, not only on account of the splendid scenery which surrounded us on our way down the bay, but also in meeting with kind friends, whose happy and jovial faces made everyone feel at home, especially those of the party who were from Toronto by invitation, and who at all times and under all circumstances think it only a pleasurable duty to lend a helping hand to our brothers in the cause of truth. The trip will long be remembered as one of the best that has taken place in this great northern country for years, and we hope that our friends will not allow another season to pass without a similar trip and under as happy auspices as the one above recorded. J. SCOTT.

MAMMOTH HOT SPRINGS, WYO., Aug. 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The recent Yellowstone letter of S. P. Putnam has been read at camp-fire and lunch parties with much interest. All who hav read it, or heard it read, pronounce it one of the most eloquent and graphic descriptions of Wonderland that has ever been written. It is a poem in prose. The word-painting is so appropriate and elegant, especially where he describes the Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone! His picture in words ought to go with Thomas Moran's painting that graces the great Rotunda of the national Capitol at Washington. The one would speak to the eye; the other to the intellect and the imagination. Mr. Putnam omitted to mention our seeing four elks on the Mammoth Geyser Plateau. These antlered monarchs of the mountain came very near us, and, as we knelt down, the ladies whirled their sunshades so as to attract their attention and excite their curiosity. On our starting to our feet they bounded away and disappeared in a pine forest.

It is astonishing the amount of valuable information that is contained in Mr. Putnam's article on the Park; all the more so as no one saw him take notes. Our party being all Rationalists, our camp-fire talks were entirely free of all supernatural explanations of the wonderful objects that met us at every step in our five days among geysers and canyons. There was no selfish or unsocial conduct to mar the harmony of our journey. I do not mean to say that Freethinkers are invariably generous and unselfish, but I do say that it is seldom that a party of six tourists can be found who act so naturally, so kindly, and even lovingly to each other as did those of the Putnam party.

It is possible that this meeting of three ladies and three gentlemen may result in a lifetime of love and harmony to two of them. No one can predict when, where, or whom the blind god may shoot. Many a couple meet in Wonderland, and it is so natural for a fair maid to seek safety under the strong, protecting arm of a gallant man when near boiling caldrons, hissing paint-pots, spouting geysers, and roaring canyons that she feels the need of a man god, and he of a guardian angel.

Higher than geyser's gush;
Deeper than canyon's rush;
Hotter than paint-pot mush,
Is that of human love.

O Love, Love, Love! thou magician that transformest a quiet pool into an all-absorbing torrent, into which madmen rush, and out of which all sanity comes to bless the world! O heart of man, thou wonderland of all lands, may thy waves never grow cold, nor thy pulsations ever cease!

G. L. HENDERSON.

MECHANIOSBURG, ILL., Aug. 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In the month of July, while paying a visit to some of my kin-folks, I paid you a visit and purchased of you Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" and a copy of "Alamontada, the Galley Slave," and you gave me three months of your tip-top, valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like the contents hugely. Please don't fail to still illustrate it. It is quite interesting to many in my town, and I think I can get you some subscribers; will try, at least, to do so.

Well, when I left your city I went to Ocean Grove to see my sister, who resides there. It is a beautiful place—a city by the sea. But, O God (if there is a God—I don't know)! it is an awful orthodox hole. The privacy of the town is secured by a high gate. All north of the lake is Asbury Park and all south is Ocean Grove. Now, nothing is allowed to enter on Sunday. In Asbury Park all vehicles run on Sunday; but in Ocean Grove you hear nothing on a Sunday only the cat purring and the kettle singing. I am carried back to the old Puritan days of Connecticut, when the hands of the clock were padlocked, the hens not allowed to set, nor the beer-barrel to work. O consistency, thou art a jewel! Will those days come again? God forbid—if there is a God! But I will come back to that Sunday morning in July when I left your office. My sister being an invalid, I was deputized to go after the milk. Out I started with my little can to get the allotted allowance, and I met a miscellaneous crowd—males, females, boys and girls, negroes, etc., returning with their milky fluid, some having to go a mile; and just outside of the gates there stood the milk-men with their large pails dealing out their fluid to the orthodox. I felt then that I wanted those rams' horns spoken of in a certain filthy book. I would hav blown such a blast on them that it would hav shattered those gates into a thousand pieces. But I had no horn to toot, and I doubt that those rams' horns ever accomplished anything in front of Jericho. Oh, when will the people be schooled up to a higher sphere so as to throw off the seals of orthodoxy? Oh, hasten the day when truth and reason will succeed!

Consider me a regular subscriber to your inestimable paper. Long may it thrive. M. L. D. M. HEISS.

P. S.—I hav R. G. Ingersoll's likeness, that I got of you, framed and hanging near my bed, so that when I open my eyes in the morning I see him and my heart swells in praise to him who is doing so much for humanity. M. H.

DENVER, COL., Aug. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The apostle of "This-world-ism" has been among us. He came to us from the Northwest, where, amid a portion of the Rockies, he had held sweet communion with the marvelous and picturesque, the sublime and the majestic, the grand and the glorious, in nature. He had clambered upon the flanks of the snow-mantled peaks, and rested 'neath their shadows in the verdant vales. He had peered into the deep, dark recesses of the mighty chasms, and had observed the awful ruggedness of the stupendous crags. His brow had been fanned by the dry, clear breezes of the mountain hight, and his vivid imagination glided into varied pathways as he beheld the records, written in geologic lore, of the mighty transformations wrought within and without this sphere during an indefinit past. Here nature baptized him anew with the spirit of freedom, and increased and brightened the fire of liberty which dwells within his breast. The vigor which this environment imparted to him found expression in the emphasis of his appeal for "Universal Mental Liberty."

Mr. Putnam arrived in Denver on Aug. 6th, and on the following Sunday evening, at the Tabor Grand Opera House, he delivered his address bearing the above title. An audience of about twelve hundred persons was in attendance. After the rendition of a piano solo by one of Denver's graceful artists, the speaker was then introduced. He spoke for about ninety minutes. The vigor of his argument and the eloquence of his appeal attracted the closest attention from his listeners. He was in grand spirits, and with all the surroundings calculated to engender and maintain such a fortunate mental condition. Upon the stage of one of the finest (if not the finest) opera houses in this broad land; with an intelligent audience before him, so nicely seated that he could almost distinguish the pupil of every eye; with applause after applause greeting him as the pertinency of his logic and the humor of his anecdote displayed the weakness and the ludicrousness of many of the orthodox positions which he assailed; possessing a sound body and a lofty mind, did he not hav the factors within and about him that could not result in any other mental condition? For thirty months there had been no radical heterodoxy preached in Denver. The meeting closing, the hearty shaking of hands, the exclamations of approbation displayed toward the sentiments expressed by Mr. Putnam, the words of good cheer exchanged, betokened a revival of Liberalism within our midst, and insured a grander success for our meeting a week later.

On Sunday. evening, Aug. 15th, the audience which greeted Mr. Putnam at the same Opera House mentioned above was increased by several hundred. All that has been remarked above as characterizing the first lecture may be applied to the second one. The subject, "The New Heaven and Earth," treated from the Secularist's standpoint, opened a field in which the logic and genius of the lecturer had free scope. One by one he removed the old gods and idols to their places in the childhood of the race, and presented to our mental vision the glorious future which is the heritage of humanity when freed from the bondage of ignorance and superstition.

The Nine Demands were read before the audience dispersed, and the sentiments expressed therein found an echo within the heart of many a listener. A call for a meeting of those favoring the organization of a Secular Union in Denver was generously responded to on the following Monday evening. Ere this our petition for a charter has been forwarded to New York, and we anticipate perfecting a permanent organization before the closing of the day on September 5th.

THOS. J. TRUSS.

LONGMONT, COL., Aug. 9, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Though you rarely hear anything from us who occupy this point in the great battle-line of Liberalism, we are not entirely "cumberers of the ground." Samuel P. Putnam has just closed a series of three lectures in our beautiful town of "many churches." The subject of his first lecture was "Universal Liberty;" that of his second, "The New Heaven and Earth;" and that of his last, "The Glory of Infidelity." These subjects were handled as only a Putnam can handle them, and they are proving to be good seed sown in good soil. The hurry of mid-harvest being upon us, the audiences were not large. No more attentiv audiences, however, ever assembled to hear the true gospel of humanity. At the close of the lectures we organized a local Secular Union, with thirteen charter members. With this little band of braves we intend to advance upon the hosts of superstition, and compel them to rally to the support of their little antiquated God, who is not cutting a very prominent figure here, anyway. He seems to be in his dotage, and to need a good deal of nursing and doctoring. The pure, thin atmosphere of this high altitude does not seem to agree with him. He did far better in his nativ country, in which he was wont to be carried about by a semi-barbarous tribe, whose tutelary divinity he was, in a goods-box, on an ox-cart, or to be kept and regaled on roast meats in the kitchen of a temple erected for his special benefit. Those people did a cruel thing who kidnapped him and brought him to this country, as cruel a thing as was ever done by the slave-traders who kidnapped negroes and brought them hither. He may be greatly improved, as the negroes hav been, by the change, but he can never become fully adapted to our climate and our higher civilization. For one, therefore, I vote that he be carried back to his nativ land, to the graves of his mother, and his son, and his other relations—if he has any others. Why keep him, anyway, at an annual expense of over a billion of dollars, when we hav not the slightest use for him?

My wife and I are taking about a dozen Liberal papers. These we hand around to our friends, and thus help sow the good seed. After thirty years of faithful labor in the school-room, I hav retired from the profession of teaching. Instead of teaching "the young idea how to shoot," I am now teaching the young tomato vines, the young onions, etc., how to shoot. In short, I am winning some laurels in a great battle with weeds in the gardens of our beautiful farm, six miles from Longmont. I hav found increased health and enjoyment in my new occupation.

JOHN R. KELSO.

TONTOGANY, O., Aug. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hope you will continue to print pictures, though I find fault with some of them. Samson should hav been lean and lank, with hair like crowbars, for his strength lay in his hair; and the artist should hav shown us how the rib was taken out of Adam. I think it would hav looked so funny to look in and see the young man's vitals squirming round. Lazarus should hav been stowed away inside of Abraham's shirt front, and had his head protruding through a buttonhole or the opening in front.

But, to take all in all, your artist has done well. He has thought of things that I would not hav thought of. I want to save my copies of the pictures, and put them in the Bible where they belong; it brings things out more clear and vivid, as it were. M. BROWN.

CHATHAM, N. Y., Aug. 21, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The Methodists hav been holding a camp-meeting at Lebanon, Columbia county, N. Y. Their meeting closed the middle of this week. Some of the incidents that transpired on and about the grounds are food for thought—I do not mean in what they call a religious point of view, but to parties who look to true principle and the rights of their fellow-men, as in every mind that should be our first and highest ambition. What if it does conflict with their or any other so-called religious views or notions? Humanity to man—what is nobler? Without that all is degrading. Please follow me in this incident, showing how this humanity to man was practiced at this camp-meeting at Lebanon. First, I wish to explain that C. L. Penrose, of Chatham, N. Y., a man of integrity and honesty, combined with a full share of business ability, chose to make arrangements with the New York, Rutland, and Montreal Railroad Company to use a portion of their depot at Lebanon as a restaurant, making arrangements in early spring, not choosing to open until the early part of August, the time of opening occurring just previous to camp-meeting. While Mr. Penrose was engaged at his business, Rev. W. L. Smith called upon him, saying that he wished him to close his business there and then; also wished him to understand that he demanded it; that in case he did not close he would hav him arrested, as "the law does not allow your business going on during this camp-meeting within two miles of our grounds." Mr. Penrose replied, "I am an American, and wish to be a law-abiding citizen; also wish to talk and reason on this subject." Rev. W. L. Smith said, "No! I hav no time to talk with you about it, but do demand you to close your business." Mr. Penrose immediately conferred with the superintendent of the road. Mr. White said, "Keep open and we will protect you." However, Mr. Penrose, though knowing that he would be protected by the railroad company, being a man who wished to avoid litigation, closed his business. Upon the camp-meeting grounds were scenes of rowdyism and drunkenness too horrible to mention.

What is needful to the rising generation? No camp-meetings; more humanity to man, woman, and child. We may well exclaim that "superstition is the child of slavery," and "reason is the lamp of the mind; the only torch of progress." J. L. BROWNING.

HAVANA, ILL., Aug. 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find 50 cents for "Order of Creation." I was sorry to hear of the trouble Mr. Reynolds had at Boonton. I hope he will come out victorious, and go on with the good work as before. I hav tried to get subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think I will succeed in getting a couple. Freethinkers here seem to be afraid to take hold. I am going to stick to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like those pictures; whatever you do, don't stop them. I am one of those fellows that don't believe the Bible is an inspired book, and I am not afraid to tell it. I can't swallow that whale story; and that rib story is too much for me; and I don't believe the world was made in six days; and there are other things in the Bible, too numerous to mention, that I don't believe. I don't know if there is a life after this or not; but if there is, I think those will enjoy it best who liv happy while here on earth. If there is a life after this, it has never been revealed unto us only as man has told it, and one man don't know any more about a hereafter than another. And no one knows anything about it. I don't believe there is a hell; but if there is, and Paine, Franklin, Jefferson, Voltaire, and the rest of the great Freethinkers are there, it certainly is not such a very bad place, after all. If I had my choice, I would rather be with these men than be with the preachers. I don't go much on these preachers. Some of them are good men, but I think they are all preaching for the money there is in it. This thing of saving souls seems to be such an easy profession, it's no wonder the ministry-market is glutted. If preachers in order to save souls had to do some labor that took a little muscle, something like sawing wood, I am afraid there would not be many souls saved unless the wages for sawing wood were extremely high. I can't see how a minister can hav the cheek to teach something he don't believe in himself; but it seems that some people will do anything nowadays for money.

I would like to hear a lecture on Freethought every Sunday, but we can't hav them because no one has got grit enough to get up to preach it. I wish Mr. Reynolds or some other Liberalist could come and giv us a few lectures. I expect to be a Freethinker all my life—to liv and die a Liberalist. A Freethinker has nothing to fear. His mind is always free from that horrible hell-fire these ministers harp so much about. I went to church the other night, and saw the leading members thereof asleep, and if one should ask them how they liked the sermon they would say it was a grand sermon, when they did not hear enough of it to tell what the text was. I am going to liv in this world the way I can be the happiest. I want to see every man think for himself. The creator gave to every man a mind and mental faculties so he could learn and investigate for himself. Giv to every man the same rights that you claim for yourself.

J. A. WEABER.

EUREKA, CAL., Aug. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: "Self-preservation is the first law of nature" is accepted as a fundamental truth by all mankind. And in a general sense, it is worthy of its universal acceptation. But not to the extent that intensely selfish persons, and cringing cowards, eagerly embrace and cherish it. Such persons interpret it to serve their own sinister and ignoble purposes. Their conception of this law incites them to save their own lives at the expense of every virtue, the sacrifice of every life, whether of friend or foe. They rob the fatherless and the widow, the sick and the afflicted, the poor and the indigent. They absorb the means and living of every other creature to swell their individual pile of wealth, to gratify their insatiable greed. They stoop to the most disreputable sneaking, lying, and swindling operations to deceive, decoy, and fleece their unsuspecting or helpless victims, and glory in their base and crafty motivs and actions, and gloat over the misery and death of those they hav the physical and legal power to rob and kill. And then, forsooth, they prate about the survival of the fittest—the most damnable doctrin anyone can advocate and indorse, as generally understood. Instead of the survival of the just, the innocent, the temperate, and peaceable persons, they urge and support the survival of the unscrupulous, the vicious, and the lawless. They adore and fawn at the feet of those whose hearts are adamant; whose conscience is numbed and paralyzed; whose whole moral and physical economy is calloused and depraved; who worship nothing but wealth and usurped power; whose religion is supreme selfishness and corruption. And their numbers are daily increasing. In fact, this age may be truthfully said to be governed by the reign of selfishness, tyranny, and inhumanity. And nowhere is this more noticeable than in what is called Christendom. Nine-tenths of what are called the upper classes are guilty of this culpable degree of selfish greed, of stolen wealth, and usurped power. They stifle their own conscience and chain the tongue of justice and truth by their criminal liberality to the church, and proclaim a greater but sham concern for the people's spiritual rather than their temporal welfare. Yet it is the grievous poverty, the vindictiv injustice, inflicted by these very classes that drive the laboring classes to desperation and crime. They gull the people with hopes of future bliss if they will be docil and obedient in this life, and pay homage to those who hav seized the power which should be properly invested in the people; who rob the people by unjust and vicious laws, and then arrogate to themselvs credit for charity and generosity by giving some of them a moiety of the wealth they hav accumulated by extortion and wrong.

They exhort the poor to practice every virtue, while they secretly or openly practice every vice. They profess to believe and follow the precepts of Jesus Christ, whose preeminent trait was disregard of self and deep concern for the poor. And to this more than anything else is Christianity indebted for the impetus it received, and the progress it has made. For Christ was no more divine than all goodness and the advocates and doers of good are divine. And the proof is that some of his words and actions are subject to criticism by reason and justice. But an all wise and just being could say or do nothing susceptible of criticism. For instance, in Matthew xxiii, 3, 4, Jesus said to the people, referring to the scribes and Pharisees, "All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their work, for they say and do not; for they bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders, but they themselvs will not move them with one of their fingers."

What was true of the scribes and Pharisees in that age is equally true of the rich and powerful now. They do bind heavy and grievous burdens on the people, but will not lift one of their fingers to help remove them. But Jesus made a mistake by exhorting them to do as they were commanded. Those who surrender their rights and bow their necks to be oppressed and enslaved are quite as culpable as those who usurp authority and inflict grievious tasks on involuntary slaves. There is not one among you but will extol the action of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and Washington, and all those who participated in the Revolution of 1776. But if they had given heed to the injunction of Jesus Christ, and obeyed those then in power, America would yet be groaning under the British yoke. Thus every one of you, by indorsing those brave men who rebelled against injustice, condemns the words of Jesus Christ. The preservation of a nation consists in every member of such nation defending to the utmost his fellow-members, and the homes and institutions dear to his heart. And only when every means has been tried, every power exhausted, should they submit to spoliation. And so it is with communities and families; every member should unite in resisting unprincipled invasion from without, and oppression within. And those who assume to rule the others without their consent; or, having obtained their consent, employ harsh and arbitrary means, are unprincipled tyrants who should be deposed by unanimous voice or unanimous force. And those who submit to tyranny and wrong are cringing cowards and contemptible slaves.

O citizens! awake from your lethargy; prune the tree while it is young, so that you may gather the fruits of justice, mercy, and peace in its old age. H. DELMAR.

V. B. DENSLOW ON THE MORAL INFLUENCE OF RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY.

VINELAND, N. J., Aug. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: At present I've not time to follow, indicate, and refute the absurdities in Mr. Denslow's finely written dissertation on this topic, but am sure it can be done. He aims to show that the adhesiv force of religion, with its worship of incomprehensible gods, is the moral power of humanity, a necessary hypocrisy that will remain the binding force of conscience and rectitude. I think the goodness manifest amid religion is the love its acceptauce does not annul; and without being deflected by religion from legitimate action and stifled by false co-action on a spurious basis, it would be a hundredfold more potent and refining. My present aim is simply to invite attention to discrepancies, and suggest ideas on the moral nature of love and religion distinctivly. Love of our kind is the inspiring light of progress. Religion exists on ignorance, is subversiv of advance, of individual and national integrity and justice; it makes faith in atoning idols paramount to ethics and principle; disparages self-poising character, and sets the love of myths above that of kindred and all humanhood. Yet, fraternal love is the great adhesiv force of unity and harmony, and, with sound intelligence and demonstrable science, will, I believe, if given opportunity, balance the positiv and negativ, the swaying forces of the human world, and possibly portions of the inhuman. Conceded facts, showing religion is the luring, suasiv side of oppressiv cruelty, condemn it; the fact that love brought to bear with and upon it is the saving, cohering element shows that, without religion, it can rest on a basis of principle, and be as much more efficient in morality and institutional propriety as truth is superior to falseness. Again, the religious and idolatrous basis, taking on the love phase of vigor, takes, through the selfish nature of the unity, not so much of the broad, fraternal, enduring, upper-brain love as the self-centering, conjugal, more vacillating, more physical, elements. This being the case, worshipful ecstasy and amoral fervor mutually stimulate and excite; hence practically induce moral turpitude instead of purity. Religious compacts thus—as well as professed, unnatural restraints—are known to foster insatiate appetites, unbalancing reason's sway and inciting to all phases of excess. We cannot walk the street without viewing specimens of Christian abnormality. The system antagonizes consistent sex-blending and pure heredity; and those outside the fold imitate church customs to escape its ostracism, and display warped wrecks of the same depraved conditions. "Sick in body and mind" labels majorities. All history and these facts demand a just, principled, logical, and secular basis for moral culture as well as civil safety. Social order would found civil equity. Social disorder holds disjointed relations through the world to-day; it brought the crisis, and needs rectifying on the bed-rock of woman's vitalization and valid position as mother of men. Distortion mars the lines of commerce, marriage, education, and wealth; and the religions of to-day forbid justice and loving harmony. A true foundation and true action upon it would soon rear the standard of justice, liberty, and personal responsibility, where fraternal love, the universally vitalizing force, might be so normally exerted as to culture and regulate generativ affection. When its friendly guidance can harmonize the spontaneity of select attraction, prostitution will be scarce. But religion, with its submissiv women, its different standards of honor for the sexes, and lash of scandal for the long-controlled, scapegoat sex, is the great hindrance to righting our wrongs. But the sooner we begin the better; the more earnestly we continue, the easier will be the labor, the more sure and complete the success. Advanced men and women are discussing the work, and many women are anxious for the chance to aid it more effectually than men allow. Whoever appreciates true life should advocate forward measures, not look to past deceiving tyrannies and plead that they are the human order, the moral influences, and must ever hold science and philosophy at their service. All the peace they ever permit is a feverish, fitful seeming produced by the submission of the masses to cruel exactions. Religion is the soft, furry, psychologic paw of the man-agent of the God myth; and love, the good element, should leave its partnership and establish its own almighty throne. Nay, I'll not say throne—even love need not be a tyrant—it is the mutual good, harmonizing justice in all directions and relations, equity hinging in unity. The nature of things assures that in such cohesion the structure of happiness will find pedestal and dome with all the jasper pillars and golden portals necessary. And these things will be obtainable after sufficient reformation has lifted good women's bowed heads above superstition, called religion, and changed their prayers to self-ennobling care, and men's hypocrisy to practical honesty. A few are laboring for the hallowed time; thousands will wheel into action when proper arrangements call.

I hope some one will review Mr. Denslow's theory systematically and convert him to the truth as it is in loving harmony. MARY E. TILLOTSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

When Baby Has Gone To Sleep.

The tired young mother's troubled air
Was proof of a load of household care,
And as baby nestled his curls of gold
Against her skirts, her brow was cold.

The baby lips quivered, he turned away;
But dear old grandmamma bade him stay,
And said, while she coaxed him not to weep,
"She'll be sorry when baby has gone to sleep."

The toils of the trying day hav fled;
The mother bends o'er the cradle-bed:
"What if the lids should never rise,
Unveiling the luster of sweet, glad eyes?"

Ah, me! how we mortals struggle here,
Forgetting much that we hold so dear!
The words of encouragement left unsaid,
Kisses kept for the lips of the dead!

O parents who toil with brain and arm
To keep your little ones safe from harm,
How much of sunshine and beauty is lost
In the dread of bridges that will never be crossed!

And children, or we of larger growth,
Might heed grandma's warning, nothing loath;
Giv voice to the love in our bosom's deep,
Nor wait till the dear ones hav gone to sleep.

Eva V. Collins.

Where Do You Liv?

I knew a man, and his name was Horner,
Who used to liv on Grumble Corner,
Grumble Corner in Crosspatch town;
And he never was seen without a frown.
He grumbled at this, and he grumbled at that;
He growled at the dog, and he growled at the cat;
He grumbled at morning, he grumbled at night;
And to grumble and growl were his chief delight.

He grumbled so much at his wife that she Began to grumble as well as he;
And all the children, wherever they went,
Reflected their parents' discontent.
If the sky was dark and betokened rain,
Then Mr. Horner was sure to complain;
And if there was not a cloud about,
He would grumble because of a threatened drought.

His meals were never to suit his taste;
He grumbled at having to eat in haste;
The bread was poor, or the meat was tough,
Or else he hadn't had half enough.
No matter how hard his wife might try
To please her husband, with scornful eye
He'd look around, and then with a scowl
At something or other, begin to growl.

One day, as I loitered along the street,
My old acquaintance I chanced to meet,
Whose face was without the look of care
And the ugly frown he used to wear.
"I may be mistaken, perhaps," I said,
As, after saluting, I turned my head,
"But it is, and it isn't, Mr. Horner,
Who lived for so long on Grumble Corner."

I met him next day, and I met him again,
In melting weather, in pouring rain:
When stocks were up, and when stocks were down.
But a smile had somehow replaced the frown.
It puzzled me much, and so, one day,
I seized his hand in a friendly way,
And said, "Mr. Horner, I'd like to know
What can hav happened to change you so."

He laughed a laugh that was good to hear,
For it told of a conscience calm and clear,
And he said, but with none of the old-time drawl,
"Why, I changed my residence, that is all!"
"Changed your residence?" "Yes," said Horner,
"It wasn't healthy on Grumble Corner.
And so I moved; 'twas a change complete,
And you'll find me now on Thanksgiving street!"

Now every day as I move along
The streets so filled with the busy throng,
I watch each face, and can always tell
Where men and women and children dwell.
And many a discontented mourner
Is spending his days on Grumble Corner,
Sour and sad, whom I long to entreat
To take a house on Thanksgiving street.

Bouquets Under Water.

The following, taken from Vick's Magazine, is a description of the process by which a bouquet of flowers may be preserved fresh for a long time:

A vessel of water is required; the vessel should be large enough to allow the submersion in it of a plate or dish holding the bouquet to be preserved, and a bell-glass to cover the bouquet. The dish or plate should contain no moss or other material; the water should be limpid and quite pure. Place the plate at the bottom of the water, and on the plate, submerging it, place the bouquet, which is maintained in an upright position by a weighted base previously attached to it. This being done, the bouquet is covered with a bell-glass, the rim of which ought to fit exactly to the flat part of the plate; the bell-glass should be entirely filled with water, and without the least air-bubble.

Then all are raised together, plate, bouquet, and bell-glass filled with water, and placed on a table, carefully wiping the exterior, but leaving on the plate, around the base of the bell-glass, a little provision of water, which prevents the entrance of air. The flowers in this condition will be preserved in all their freshness for several weeks, and their beauty is increased by a great number of bubbles of gas, produced by the respiration of the leaves, and which attach themselvs to the petals, appearing like pearls. The edge of the plate and the water that it contains should be concealed by a light bed of moss, in which are set some other flowers. In the evening, by artificial light, a bouquet thus arranged produces a charming effect.

A Hard Question.

A Chestnut-street miss of less than five summers, who was playing in the yard and observing the works of nature, surprised her father the other day with the following questions and original conclusion:

"Papa, does God make the worms?"

"Yes, daughter."

"Papa, does God make the hopper toad to eat the worms up?"

"I s'pose so."

"Well, I should like to know what he bothered his head with the worms for if he had to make the hopper toad to eat them"

Her father did not attempt to unravel this juvenil puzzle.—Norwich Bulletin.

Popular Science.

Liquefied oxygen is lighter than water, and a little heavier than alcohol, according to a French chemist, who has calculated its specific gravity as 0.888.

According to Mr. J. Harrington Douty, of the asylum at Worcester, England, an imperfect supply of oxygen, or simply breathing a vitiated atmosphere, may suffice to produce a mental disorder known as melancholia.

The deep sea is illumined only by the deep green sunlight that has passed through a vast stratum of water, and therefore lost all the red and orange rays by absorption. The deep sea star-fishes are nearly all orange, orange-red, or scarlet, even down to three thousand fathoms.

Sound Principle but Poor Poetry.

Jacob Halstead, who died recently at Elbridge, N. Y., is said to hav lived according to the following motto:

I'll get my living by the sweat of my face,
And bear good will to the human race;
I'll pay my debts as soon as due,
And wear my old clothes till I can make new.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—CHARADE.

My first, if Milton truth doth state,
Is a chariot used by those called great;
My second is a squirrel, a bird, or monkey—
And sometimes even the blundering donkey;
My whole a fabric, finely wrought,
From Asian looms at first was brought;
Tho' now the Yankees' close attention,
Hav made it almost their invention.

Not in mane, but in rhyme.

3.—THESE THREE TURKS.—AN ANAGRAM.

These Three Turks, of whom I tell,
Anywhere on earth may dwell.
Any land in all the earth
Well may be their place of birth.
Any language they may speak—
Latin, Hebrew, Chinese, Greek.
Every age and clime are theirs;
They are Nature's only heirs.
For her verities they search,
Unconfined by creed or church.
Count them not as numbers count,
In humanity's amount;
Count them by their tho'ts and works—
These Three Turks; These Three Turks.

These Three Turks, again I scan,
Neither woman, child, nor man.
Tho' they utter not a tone,
Yet their language is my own.
Purest gems of ray serene,
In their costumes may be seen
Diamonds, pearls, and agates rare,
All arranged with taste and care;
Roman caps and richly dressed,
Every week one is my guest;
Voiceless, yet their rhythmic signs
Thrilling through my being shines;
No regret for deafness lurks—
This I owe to These Three Turks.

Irwin, Ia. J. K. P. Baker.

4.—WHY?

1.—A body is heavier at the surface of the earth than it is above or below? Why is this?

2.—Why does not the air flow in and out of one's lungs the same after death as before?

Correspondence.

A LETTER IN RHYME.

Strasburg, Ill., Aug. 16, 1886.

Papa and I are Liberals,
Of the very brightest hue;
We spell our names Y-o-r-k;
With interest your works pursue.
We liv in little Strasburg town;
Our county's name is Shelby;
Illinois is our dear old state;
The Truth Seeker is our stand-by,

Although we're looked upon by some
Of John R. God's dear people
As traitors mean, that should be hung.
But why? We're very civil.
Oh, our "sad fate" we will not rue,
And go to church a-trembling,
And sit so still, afraid to stir,
Lest the devil should come tumbling!

John R. is a prominent man;
He sits on a golden throne,
Like old King John, of En-gli-and,
With tyranny rules the world.
Why in the name of common sense
The old fellow don't resign,
And giv us poor sinners a chance
Is a secret beyond mankind.

Resign—why not? Are we not smart?
Hav we not tasted the fruit?
Giv us the throne and a good harp;
We'll show what we will do.
There will be a world pure and bright,
Free from hell and damnation,
With hearts made happy and so light,
Not knowing predestination.

If it pleases the editor
To make public these verses,
In the grand old Corner so dear,
'Twill make one of the children's hearts
Gladden with pleasure, and, perhaps,
Again from her you will hear.

Ida York.

Idaho Springs, Col., July 29, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I feel that I may be excused for addressing you so freely, since, though personally unacquainted with you, I hav, in company with my two little truth seekers, shared your thoughts in the Children's Corner. I inclose a contribution for that department if you see fit to publish it.

With sincere wishes for your success in the work of entertaining and instructing our young folks, I remain,

Mrs. Eva V. Collins.

Palatka, Fla., Aug. 16, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: The mathematical problem (1.) in the Children's Corner of The Truth Seeker of the 14th inst., like everything else, "is quite easy to those who know how to do it;" but don't you think it a little hard for children? Not many girls and boys of less than sixteen or eighteen can solve an algebraical equation of the second degree containing two unknown quantities, after it is presented to them; much less can they form from a puzzling question such a one as will lead to the true answer. Ask Mr. Scott to be a little easy on the tender and undeveloped brains, less precocious, mayhap, than his own; and he will doubtless solicit thereby more general interest in, and contribute more largely to the amusement and profit of, the Corner.

A's fence will hav to be 520 rods long (with five sides). If Mr. Scott wishes to amuse himself by constructing mathematical puzzles suitable to mature minds, he can send one or two—just little ones—to Lewis Morris (Box 474).

Springfield, Ill., July 31, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: My name is Fannie Florence Hudson. I am eleven years old; will be twelve in September. Mrs. Cellers, my music-teacher, has just given me The Truth Seeker to read. I hav read but little in it as yet, but as far as I hav gone I like it. I like the Children's Corner very much, but I am going to read it all through. My school was out the 3d of June. It will begin again the first of September next. My brothers read The Truth Seeker and said they were going to write to you. I hav some little white rabbits. There are seven of them. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday at the Second Methodist Episcopal church here. When I went to school I was in the Fourth Reader, and had grammar, arithmetic, writing, reading, drawing, and geography. Well, I must close, as it is getting so long. I thought I would write to you to amuse some little folks in the Children's Corner.

Your little friend, Fannie F. Hudson.

Brooklyn, Aug. 19, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I feel a little reluctant at writing, knowing that your time must be valuable, and much taken up attending to the many calls and answering the numerous correspondence which your position of editress of a portion of so widely-circulated and much-needed a paper as The Truth Seeker naturally involves.

Away back in the years I often wondered why papa took so much interest in the paper, and anxiously looked for its arrival and perused its pages eagerly. He used to often mention Mr. Bennett's name, and the persecution he encountered for his boldness and manly courage against his opponents.

I hav lately read with interest your and Mrs. Slenker's articles, and hav profited much therefrom. I am particularly interested in the Children's Corner, for you know the church people strain every nerve to get hold of the little ones. You should see some of our anniversaries here in Brooklyn. Mothers are put to their wit's end for weeks to invent some gingerbread and flashy habiliments to adorn their children for that turn-out. Poor washwomen and others, that never see a $5 bill above their wants, will stint and scrape money to compete and cope with their more wealthy and opulent neighbor's children. Children with banners bearing all sorts of silly inscriptions march under a scorching sun to satisfy the conceited vanity of their minister and teachers.

Of course, the little ones know no better, and are taken away by the excitement, and music, and gorgeousness of the affair, but when gray-headed men and women and the unthinking populace lend aid by presence, and window-adornments, and house-decoration, I often think that very little common sense is given in religious matters.

I am writing foreign to what I intended. I wished to thank you for the kindness of noticing my story and publishing it. It was my first effort, and I had only a faint idea that it would be noticed at all, for certainly I could not bring myself to believe that I would be the lucky one out of so many as would compete out of so intelligent a constituency as The Truth Seeker readers.

It may be that you would visit Brooklyn some time; if so, I would be pleased to make it pleasant for you to stay with us, if possible.

I am yours, Laura Slensby.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Making the Episcopal Church Loyal.

Religious Jotting in the Tribune.

The other day, in San Francisco, General Sherman told a little anecdote about an Episcopal clergyman that may be worth repeating. While the general occupied Memphis during the war, he issued an order that all the churches should open on Sunday. "The day after the order was promulgated," said the general, "I was waited upon at my headquarters by a clergyman, who announced himself as the Rev. Mr. ——, of the Episcopal church, of that city. He was got up in the highest style of clerical garb, and his face wore the expression of a predetermined martyr. I said: 'Sit down; I am very glad to see you. What do you want? What can I do for you?' He answered, 'General, I hav seen your order about opening the churches on Sunday, and I am a good deal embarrassed to know how to obey it, or how to state my objection.' I replied: 'There is no embarrassment in obeying an order, and as for objections, I don't care to hear them. You obey the order, and never mind your objections.' He replied, 'But, General, you are aware that since our unhappy civil war commenced the ritual of the Episcopal church South has undergone a material change.' 'Has it?' said I; 'I hav not noticed it.' He said, 'We are now directed by our church to pray for the Hon. Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederate States, and, of course, I am ecclesiastically compelled to obey the directions of the church,' and he looked at me with the expression of a martyr about to be taken to the stake and burnt alive. I regarded him for a moment, and then said: 'Oh, never mind; pray for Davis; pray for him just as hard as you can. He needs every prayer you can get off; but, my friend, I am dreadfully afraid praying won't do him any good; he has gone up.' He looked curiously at me, and then said, 'Will you require me to pray for Abraham Lincoln, president of the United States?' 'By no means, my dear fellow,' said I. 'Let him alone. He don't need any prayers. Abraham Lincoln is just as sure of salvation as any man who has ever died, or ever will die.'

"Next Sunday morning it occurred to me I would go to this church of his and see how he got on. Services had just begun when I got in, but I took my seat where I could hav a good view of him and he of me. He saw me before I got half-way down the aisle. He went on with the service, and when he arrived at the point of conflict between the Episcopal church South and the order of Sherman, with one eye on the prayer-book and the other eye on me, he prayed for 'all in authority over us,' left out Davis, and let Lincoln alone. I had no more trouble with the Episcopal church after that."

Paine Vindicated!

—o—

A thorough and overwhelming reply to the New York Observer's slanderous attacks upon the Author-Hero of the American Revolution. Containing both the slanders and their refutation.

BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

THE RISE OF INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Octavo, 458 pp. PRICE, $3.50.

ELEMENTS OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY

FOR

HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2,000 years B.C. on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Slenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixon.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable. It may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. 1,075 pages, 8vo. Cloth, $3.00; leather, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church; Their Crimes and Persecutions. 8vo. 1,119 pages. Cloth, $3.00: leather, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times. Two Volumes. Written in prison. In cloth, $3.00 per volume, or $5.00 for the two volumes; in leather, $7.00; in morocco, gilt edges, $8.00.

From Behind the Bars. A series of letters written in prison. Over 700 pages. Price $1.50.

A Truth Seeker in Europe. A series of letters written during a visit of ten weeks in Europe. Giving some account of the International Freethinkers' Congress held at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was a delegate, followed by a description of what he saw in England, France, Holland, and Italy. The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 850 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers, 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. 700 pages. Paper covers, 75 cents; cloth, $1.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity, between D. M. BENNETT and Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price. $1.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. BENNETT and CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

BENNETT affirms; MAIR denies. This is an exhaustiv discussion. Price, $1.50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This gives a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon MR. BENNETT. Price, cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

An Open Letter to Jesus Christ. 5 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. Being 3,000 questions propounded to his Jewish Godship upon a great variety of subjects. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Deacon Skidmore's Letters. First Deacon of Zion Hill Baptist Church, giving many church incidents and his evolution from Christianity to Liberalism. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Book of Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh: also the Epistle of Bennett the Apostle to the Truth Seekers. Cloth, $1.00

The First Epistle of Bennett the Apostle to the Truth Seekers 10 cents.

The Great Religions of the World. 10 cents.

A STUDY
OF
BY LEWIS G. JANES.

This book treats of the natural evolution of the Christian religion, its historical antecedents in Palestinian Judaism and Roman Paganism; investigates the history of the founder of Christianity in the light of the latest scientific criticism of the New Testament; shows that the true story of the Man Jesus, and his genuin teachings are separable from the later legendary accretions which hav confounded him with the mythical Christ, and traces the natural development of Christian dogma and ecclesiastical institutions. Complete references and full index. 320pp. 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price $1.50.

"SHOPPEL'S MODERN HOUSES" No. 3.
(Just Published, July 1, 1886) CONTAINS:
A colored frontispiece showing the modern style of painting.
A cardboard supplement, ingeniously drawn and colored, to supply all the neccessary pieces for constructing a model house, with plain directions for putting them together.
While the supplement affords both old and young the greatest amusement, it is more than a toy. It is, in fact, a most practical lesson in Architecture; a perfect, scaled model of one of our most popular designs, so exact that it is useful to builders.
55 New Designs for Residences (cost varying from $500 to $15,000).
2 New Designs for Barns.
1 New Design for a Chapel.
Drawings and description of a model Kitchen (by Maria Parloa) and a perfect Cistern.

Earthquakes in Italy and Greece hav destroyed six towns, killed 600 persons, and seriously injured 1,000.

Fifty thousand Socialists attended a recent meeting in London to protest against the tyrranny of the police.

The English government in Burmah is forcing the nativs to adopt English laws, customs, language, and religion.

At Newport, R. I., on Aug. 28th, each policeman was provided in the morning with a warrant, and sixty-four arrests were made for illegal sale of liquor.

Evangelist Moody will shortly open his sixth training-school for Christian workers in Chicago, where $150,000 has been raised toward the sum needed for suitable buildings.

Mr. Blaine has opened the Republican campaign by a speech in Maine, in which he says he has no new nostrums to offer for the cure of labor troubles, but is a firm believer in the efficacy of the protectiv tariff.

At the late English Methodist conference members stated that "there is in the breasts of the young people a suspicion that Methodism is played out and incapable of adapting itself to a stirring, democratic age."

The Belfast districts in Ireland are overrun with hoodlums who hav lived on rioting so long that they are anxious to continue that idle life. Bailiffs when attempting evictions hav been met with boiling water and hot lime.

Burglars in Massachusetts are despoiling churches of their valuable ornaments. Perhaps the depredators are merely disguised taxpayers of the vicinity, endeavoring to recover by force that which was taken by force.

Twelve assemblies of the Knights of Labor met in Chattanooga on Aug. 28th and nominated candidates for the state Senate and state legislature, and three aldermen for the city. This is the first action of the kind taken by the order in the South since its organization.

Henry George, having been offered the nomination for mayor of this city by the labor organizations, has required as a condition of his acceptance the signatures of 30,000 voters to promises to support him. Papers for such signatures are being vigorously circulated.

For some time reports hav foreshadowed a rupture between France and the holy see and the recall of the French ambassador to the Vatican. Radicals hav urged the French government to break finally with the pope; but this has not been done, and peace is being concluded.

German Socialists recently held memorial services commemorating the labors of Ferdinand Lassalle, Karl Marx, and other deceased leaders, applauded the martyrs in European and American prisons, and, though totally disapproving of the Anarchist deeds in Chicago, nevertheless extended sympathy to those "misguided fellow-men."

Rumors giv the details of a plot within the Knights of Labor to assassinate Mr. Powderly. It is asserted that three years ago the Home Club, a New York wing that was opposed to him, hired two New York thugs to take his life. These men went to the Fulton Ferry one night and waited for Mr. Powderly. He was to hav addressed a Brooklyn meeting that night, but, for some unexplained cause, was delayed. This saved his life.

OF THE

NEW YORK STATE

FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION,

TO BE HELD AT

White Sulphur Springs Park, Saratoga Co., New York.

From Thursday, Sept. 2d, to Sunday, Sept. 12th, 1886.

Reduction on all railroad routes. Special excursion rates to Saratoga from all points.

The best Liberal speakers will be in attendance. The following is the list so far as they hav accepted: John Peck—subject, "The Gods on Exhibition;" Lucy N. Colman—subjects, "Reminiscences in the Life of a Reformer," and "Woman's Duty To-day in the World's Work;" W. S. Bell—subject, "Conflict Between Christianity and Civilization;" Mrs. F. C. Reynolds—subject, "Woman: Past, Present, and Future;" J. L. Andrew—subject, "Modern Infidelity;" Miss Susan H. Wixon.

Splendid facilities are afforded for boating, bathing, fishing, driving; magnificent scenery. The best dancing pavilion in the state. Fine band. Everything necessary to an enjoyable occasion. All the advantages of a visit to Saratoga will be afforded visitors, thus combining the attractions of that popular watering-place with those of the convention.

Season tickets, admitting the bearer to all lectures, $1.00. First-class board, $1.00 per day. (It will greatly facilitate matters if orders for season tickets with remittance accompany applications for rooms.) Applications for tickets and rooms should be addressed to C. B. Reynolds, 33 Clinton Place, New York. Contributions, necessary to defray preliminary expenses, may be sent to the treasurer, E. M. Macdonald.

Thomas Paine. The Apostle of Religious and Political Liberty. Tells the story of the Author-Hero's life, delineates the leading traits of his character and genius, and vindicates his name from the aspersions cast upon it. Choice extracts from "Common Sense," "American Crisis," "Rights of Man," and "Age of Reason" are given; also, tributes to Paine's character from more than one hundred noted persons of Europe and America, many of them written expressly for this work. Second edition, 160 pages, printed on fine tinted paper, neatly bound, and containing a handsome steel portrait of Paine. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Image Breaker. Six Lectures: Decline of Faith, Protestant Intolerance, Washington an Unbeliver; Jefferson an Unbeliever; Paine and Wesley; Christian Sabbath. Each 5 cents; bound, paper, 25 cents; per doz. 40 cts.

Bible Inquirer. A Key to Bible Investigation. Revised Edition. This pamphlet refers specifically to 148 Bible propositions, with numerous references and citations, that are contradicted in terms by the same number of other propositions in the same book. Price 25 cents.

of Thought.

ll recently made one of his He said that "if Christianity and Emerson are in hell togersoll is making no wild easily turn to the written of the church, and furnish his statement. The religious nd Longfellow is well known. They stood in direct and positiv opposition to these beliefs which a large part of Christendom still claim to be essential to salvation. Logically and mercilessly interpreted, these standards would leave no other conclusion open to us than that adopted by Mr. Ingersoll concerning the future destiny of Longfellow and Emerson, and, we may also add, of Mr. Darwin.—Christian Register.

Wandering tribes do not, as a rule, consider it wrong to rob outside the circle of their clan. Their God is therefore a robber like themselvs. If they settle in a fertil country, pass into the agricultural state, build towns, and become powerful citizens, with property of their own, they change their views respecting theft, and accordingly their God forbids it in his laws. But it sometimes happens that the sayings and doings of the tent-gods are preserved in writings which are accepted as revelation by the people of a later and a better age. Then may be observed the curious, and by no means pleasing, spectacle of a people outgrowing their religion, and believing that their god performed actions which would be punished with the gallows if they were done by men.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

It is a gentleman's business to cultivate his mind with knowledge, with generous dispositions, with all worthy accomplishments befitting his condition and qualifying him for honorable action; so that he may excel, and bear himself above the vulgar level, no less in real inward worth than in exterior garb; that he be not a gentleman merely in name or show.—Isaac Barrow.

In the Pentateuch we hav a book, presented to us by a barbarous and ignorant people, written in an age when they were still more barbarous, and, in all probability long after the facts which it relates. [The investigations of Bishop Colenso, Robertson Smith, and many others, hav turned what then was looked on as "probability" into moral certainty, and none now but the laggards and dastards of an effete theology would dare to say that the Pentateuch is the work of Moses] corroborated by no concurring testimony, and resembling those fabulous accounts which every nation givs of its origin. Upon reading this book we find it full of miracles and prodigies. It givs an account of the state of the world and of human nature entirely different from the present; of our fall from that state; of the age of man extended to near a thousand years; of the destruction of the world by a deluge; of the arbitrary choice of one people as the favorits of heaven, and that people the countrymen of the author; of their deliverance from bondage by prodigies the most astonishing imaginable. I desire anyone to lay his hand upon his heart, and, after a serious consideration, declare whether he thinks that the falsehood of such a book, supported by such testimony, would be more extraordinary and miraculous than all the miracles it relates, which is, however, necessary to make it be received according to the measure of probability that I hav just established.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

If we were only required to accept the authority of the Jews for the belief that they sprung from Abraham, were captivs in Egypt, received a complete code of laws and systems of theocratic polity from Moses, conquered Canaan, and committed manifold follies, frauds, and cruelties in their national career, we might accede to the demand without much recalcitration. But we are called on to admit something very different from this. We are required to believe that Jehovah, the ruler of all worlds, the pure, spiritual, supreme, ineffable creator of the universe, our father who is in heaven, selected one favored people from the rest of his children; sanctioned fraud; commanded cruelty; contended, and for a while in vain, with the magi of other gods; wrestled bodily with one patriarch; ate cakes and veal with another; sympathized with and shared in human passions; and manifested "scarcely one untainted moral excellence," and we are required to do this painful violence to our feelings and our understandings, simply because these coarse conceptions prevailed some thousand years ago among a people whose history, as written by themselvs, is certainly not of a nature to inspire us with any extraordinary confidence in their virtue or their intellect.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

Our greatest glory is not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.—Confucius.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 13. No. 37. PUBLISHED WEEKLY. New York, Saturday, September 11, 1886. 33 CLINTON PLACE. $3.00 per year.

A HINT FOR ANTHONY COMSTOCK'S SOCIETY.

Notes and Clippings.

HENRY GEORGE will probably run for mayor of New York. If the workingmen vote as they hoot, he will be elected. Any way, he is a dangerous opponent of the candidates of the old parties.

HEATHENISM clearly defined: Sunday-School Superintendent: "Now, children, tell me what heathens are?" Small Boy (who has been reading about the Belfast riots): "Heathens is folks what don't fight over religion."—Omaha World.

ONE is shocked by the tragedy of the Charleston earthquake. Yet the ravage of life in this city alone every week of the year, through the dry rot of our false social system, is a hundredfold greater than that by the quakes of the past week in Charleston.—John Swinton.

DEXTER BROWN, a boy preacher of the Methodist church, noted for his eloquence and power as a revivalist, committed suicide at his home in Oneonta, N. Y., on Tuesday morning. This is an unfortunate occurrence, since there is apparently no way in which it can be turned to bolster up the religious theory that only Infidels commit suicide.

THE Rev. Mr. Kittredge, of Chicago, preached his first sermon from his new pulpit in this city last Sunday. He comforted his congregation with the assurance that there was never before so little skepticism as now. In the course of his remarks he also said that our moral average was not so high as it has been. He did not discuss the two propositions in connection with each other.

A DISPATCH from Shanghai, China, says: "Advices from Ching-Too-Foo, chief city of the province of Ssuchnan, say that the nativs of the eastern part of that province and those of Northern Cochin China, hav risen against the Christians, and are massacring them and destroying their property. This activ persecution is attributed to the imprudence of the English and American missionaries."

THE following from the Investigator will be gratifying to others besides the patrons of that paper: "It givs us great pleasure to state, and we are sure our readers will be very glad to learn the fact, that Mr. Mendum is recovering his former health, though he is not able as yet to come to the office. He has had a very severe and dangerous illness, but thanks to the kind care of his family and a skilful doctor, together with his own patience and resolution, he has been saved to the Investigator and to the Liberal cause for many years, we hope, in the future."

REMLY SIDELINGER, the owner of the Boston Knight, besides performing the duties of editor of his paper, pursues the ancient and honorable vocation of barber at his barber-shop in Boston. But his editorial services to labor hav offended his wealthy customers, without attracting others. He now issues, through his paper, the following appeal in favor of his barber-shop. "Brother Knights, I wish to say a few words to you about my own affairs. I am not making a cent out of my paper, and, since working in the cause of labor, I hav lost as customers from my barber-shop, where I do make my living, all rich customers who are opposed to organized labor. The result is, that unless friends of labor come to my support by giving me their trade in the barbering line, I will hav to go to the wall. Will you do it?—REM. S. SIDELINGER, barber, 20½ Leverett street." Mr. Sidelinger is a Freethinker, and a long-time reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He merits patronage and encouragement.

THE Key East, N. J., Summer School of Philosophy is discussing the labor question. The latest speaker solves the question thus: "God declared that man should eat his bread from the sweat of his brow. In the law as given at Sinai the commandment was, 'Six days shalt thou labor.' The work is to be as constant as is the demand for food and raiment. This law takes precedence of all others in relation to our material life. The clergy are the heaven-ordained teachers of the people. It is in the power of the clergy of New York city to set in motion during the coming winter a movemcnt that will quickly solve the difficulty."

THE Central Labor Union, in promulgating a call to the workingmen to join in the labor parade of Sept. 6th, says: "Show that you are with us in our efforts to place man in the position his creator and nature intended he should occupy." For the benefit of the Central Labor Union the following outline of the "creator's" intention with regard to man's position may be given. It is found in the early part of Genesis, and reads: "Cursed is the ground for thy sake: in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life: thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return unto the ground." That is very much like the present condition of the majority of men.

CAMP-MEETING season is in full blast now, and this story, fresh from a meeting up in the mountains, is in order: A very eloquent exhorter was holding forth on the sin of neglecting religion. "What is it, my brethren and sisters, he said, "that you neglect when you neglect religion? Why, it's the salvation of your souls. You think murder is a great sin? Well, so it is. You think stealing is a great sin? So it is, sure enough. You think bearing false witness is a great sin? So it is. But I tell you, my brethren and sisters, if you neglect religion that is the greatest sin of of all. Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added unto you!" And a shout of "Hallelujah!" rose from the congregation.—Boston Record.

THE people of the island of St. Kilda are great Sabbatarians. A correspondent of a Glasgow paper writes that he was refused more than a cupful of water for his Sunday morning ablutions, on the ground that the Free Church minister declared it to be a violation of the Fourth Commandment to draw water on Sunday. The islanders fill in the day with long sessions of public worship. There is a sermon of two hours' length in the morning, followed by a short interval for refreshments. A bell then rings up the congregation for a two hours' sermon in the afternoon. From the church the St. Kildians proceed to the Sunday-school, and are then allowed another short interval for tea. In the evening there is another religious service, at which the spinsters and bachelors each repeat a psalm. If through the severity of these religious exercises any St. Kildian goes to sleep, the minister takes him to task by name, thus: "Lachlan, waken your wife; she won't nod much in hell, I think."

Evolution and Special Creation.

III.—CONCLUSION.

PSYCHICAL POWERS.

This is the great stronghold of the opponents of evolution. They maintain that, whatever may hav taken place with regard to physical powers and bodily organs, it is clear that the higher intellectual faculties of man could not so hav originated; that those, at least, must be the result of a special creation, and must hav been called into existence when human beings first appeared upon the stage of life by some supernatural power. Such persons further urge that, even if it could be shown beyond doubt that the marvelously constructed body of man, with its beautifully adjusted parts of bone and muscle, nerve and brain, skin and mucous membrane, had its origin in evolution, yet no light whatever would be thrown upon the source of the wondrous powers of judgment and memory, understanding and will, perception and conception. This argument, no doubt, to some at first appears specious, but the question is, Is it sound? The assumption seems to be that we meet with these powers now for the first time, and that, therefore, it is here that a special creation must be called in to account for their origin, their character being so different from anything that has previously crossed our path in this investigation. But assuredly this is not correct. Some of these powers are certainly to be met with in the lower animals—a few of them low down in the scale—and for the rest the difference will be one of degree more than of quality. It will not surely be maintained that perception is peculiar to man; it must exist wherever there are organs of sense, and these extend in some form or other to the lowest phase of animal life. Volition is also met with in all the higher animals; and memory may be observed in the dog, horse, elephant, cat, camel, and numerous other mammals with whose habits every-day life makes us familiar. Even judgment in the form of comparison is often displayed by the domestic animals, the dog in particular. Dr. H. Bischoff, in his "Essay on the Difference Between Man and Brutes," says: "It is impossible to deny to animals, qualitativly and quantitativly, as many mental faculties as we find in man. They possess consciousness. They feel, think, and judge; they possess a will which determins their actions and motions. Animals possess attachment; they are grateful, obedient, good-natured; and again, false, treacherous, disobedient, revengeful, jealous, etc. Their actions frequently evince deliberation and memory. It is in vain to derive such actions from so-called instinct, which unconsciously compels them so to act." Max Müller, also, in his "Science of Language," admits that brutes hav five senses like ourselvs; that they hav sensations of pain and pleasure; that they hav memory; that they are able to compare and distinguish; hav a will of their own, show signs of shame and pride, and are guided by intellect as well as by instinct.

With such facts as these before us, what reason hav we for supposing that these psychical powers are not as likely to hav been evolved as the bodily organs? There is no break whatever to be seen in the chain at the point of their appearance in man. If the mental powers of the lower animals hav come by evolution, there is not a shadow of reason for supposing that those of man came in any other way, for they are all of the same quality, differing only in degree. No doubt, as Mr. Darwin says, "the difference between the mind of man and that of the highest ape is immense." And yet, as he also remarks, "great as it is, it is certainly one of degree and not of kind." The highest powers of which man can boast—memory, judgment, love, attention, curiosity, imitation, emotion—may all be met with in an incipient form in lower animals. Let any man analyze his mental faculties one by one—not look at them in a state of combination, for that will be calculated to mislead—and then say which of them is peculiar to man as man, and not to be found in a smaller degree much lower in the scale of being. Even the capacity for improvement, in other words, for progress, is not peculiar to man, as Mr. Darwin has shown by innumerable examples of great force and beauty.

The emotions hav often been spoken of as being peculiar to man, but evidently with no degree of accuracy. Terror exists in all the highest of the lower animals as surely as it does in man, and shows itself in the same way. It causes the heart to palpitate, a tremor to pass along the muscles, and even the hair to undergo that change which is called "standing on end," in the horse, the dog, and other animals, as in the human species. "Courage and timidity," observes Darwin, "are extremely variable qualities in the individuals of the same species, as is plainly seen in our dogs. Some dogs and horses are ill-tempered and easily turn sulky; others are good-tempered; and these qualities are certainly inherited. Everyone knows how liable animals are to furious rage and how plainly they show it." The love of a dog for his master is proverbial; indeed, this noble animal has been known to lick the hand of the vivisector whilst undergoing at his hands the severest torture. And revenge is often manifested by the lowest animals—not simply the sudden impulse which avenges itself at the moment for pain inflicted or wrongs done, but long, brooding feeling which may smolder for months, waiting for the opportunity for manifesting itself, and when that comes, bursting out into a flame violent and hateful. There are thousands of cases on record in which this has happened, especially in the case of monkeys which hav been kept tame. And, perhaps, the personal experience of most persons can furnish an example of the truth of this allegation.

The social instincts are plainly seen in many of the lower animals; not, of course, in that perfect form in which they are met with in man, but the difference here again is one of degree only. Many animals experience pleasure in the company of their fellows, and are unhappy at a separation being effected. They will show sympathy one for another, and even perform services for each other's benefit. Some animals lie together in large numbers, and never separate except for a very short time, and then only for a purpose which they clearly understand. This is the case with sheep, rats, American monkeys, and also with rooks, jackdaws, and starlings. Darwin observes: "Everyone must hav noticed how miserable horses, dogs, sheep, etc., are when separated from their companions, and what affection the two former kind will show on their reunion. It is curious to speculate upon the feelings of a dog who will rest peacefully for hours in a room with his master or any of the family without the least notice being taken of him, but who if left for a short time by himself barks and howls dismally." Here we find the origin of the social faculty in man. It is very easy to imagin the course of development which this must hav taken in order to hav reached its way to the highest form as we see it in the human species. The psychical powers appear first in an incipient form, and then gradually develop through a long course of ages, until they rise to the hight of human variety. Other influences, such as the power of language, further the development, these powers themselvs being the result of the process of evolution. The question how far language is confined to man is one of great interest to the student of evolution. In replying to the inquiry, "What is the difference between the brute and man?" Max Müller says: "Man speaks, and no brute has ever uttered a word. Language is our Rubicon, and no brute has ever crossed it." Referring to this statement, Dr. Page remarks:

"Are not these powers of abstraction and language a matter of degree rather than of kind? Do not the actions of many of the lower animals sufficiently indicate that they reason from the particular to the general? And hav they not the power of communicating their thoughts to one another by vocal sounds which cannot be otherwise regarded than as language? No one who has sufficiently studied the conduct of our domestic animals but must be convinced of this power of generalization; no one who has listened attentivly to the various calls of mammals and birds can doubt they hav the power of expressing their mental emotions in language. Their powers of abstraction may be limited, and the range of their language restricted; but what shall we say of the mental capacity of the now extinct Tasmanian, which could not carry him beyond individual conceptions, or of the monosyllabic click-cluck of the Bushman, as compared with the intellectual grasp and the inflectional languages of modern Europe? If it shall be said that these are matters merely of degree, then are the mental processes and languages of the lower animals, as compared with those of man, also matters of degree—things that manifest themselvs in the same way and by the same organs, but differing in power according to the perfection of the organs through which they are manifested."

The doctor's view of this matter receives a striking corroboration from the following excerpt from the introduction to Agassiz's "Contributions to the Natural History of the United States:" "The intelligibility of the voice of animals to one another, and all their actions connected with such calls, are also a strong argument of their perceptiv power, and of their ability to act spontaneously and with logical sequence in accordance with these perceptions. There is a vast field open for investigation in the relations between the voice and the actions of animals, and a still more interesting subject of inquiry in the relationship between the cycle of intonations which different species of animals of the same family are capable of uttering, which, so far as I hav yet been able to trace them, stand to one another in the same relations as the different, so-called, families of languages."

The moral powers of man hav been evolved in a manner similar to that in which the other forces belonging to the human race were evolved. All that we see in the evolution of human conduct is the result of the great and potent law of evolution. To quote the words of M. J. Savage in his suggestiv book, "The Morals of Evolution:" "Notwithstanding the fact that conduct is so large a part of life, there has never been in the past any universal, even any general, agreement as to its fundamental principles, as to wherein right and wrong consist, as to the authority on which they rest, as to what they would ultimate in when wrought out into practical details. Just as there has never been any agreement concerning the world's religions, so there has never been any general argreement concerning principles of morality or human conduct. But now the course of human thought has been so largely studied, the world's past customs are so widely known, the principles and laws of the external universe and the nature of human society are coming to be so clearly comprehended, that we must believe that the time is not far distant, even if it has not arrived already, when we may be able to agree as to what right and wrong mean, as to where they hav come from, and what they shall ultimately come to when acted out in human character." Thus it is that as time rolled on nobler and more lofty conceptions of human duty and more accurate sanctions for human conduct hav been evolved. Within the domain of civilization, human sacrifice, self-mutilation, persistent neglect of the world, and preference for poverty are no longer regarded as ethical requirements; neither within the realms of scientific and philosophic culture do people base moral action on the supposed will of God, the hope of heaven, or the authority of the church. "It is said," writes Savage, "that there can be no permanent and eternal law of morality unless we believe in a God and a future life. But I believe that this moral law stands by virtue of its own right, and would stand just the same without any regard to the question of immortality or the discussion between Theism and Atheism. If there be no God at all, am I not living? Are there not laws according to which my body is constructed—laws of health, laws of life, laws that I must keep in order to liv and in order to be well? If there be no God at all, are you not existing? Hav I a right to steal your property, to injure you, to render you unhappy, because, forsooth, I choose to doubt whether there is a God, or because you choose to doubt whether there is a God? Are not the laws of society existing in themselvs and by their own nature? Suppose all the world should suddenly lose its regard for truth, and become false through and through, so that no man could depend upon his brother, would not society be disintegrated, disorganized? Would not all commercial and social life suddenly become impossible? Would not humanity become a chaos and a wreck, and that without any sort of regard to the question as to whether men believed in a God or did not believe in one? These laws are essential in the nature of things; and they stand, and you liv by keeping them, and die by breaking them, whether there is a God or not." These are the accurate and ennobling views of existence born of minds which evolution has raised from the ignorant depths of the past to the intellectual hights of the present.

On all sides, then, the candid and impartial observer may behold undoubted evidence in favor of the doctrin of evolution. We see it in the various changes of the solar system. There are (1) fire mists, (2) globes of gas, (3) condensed oceans, (4) crust formation, (5) mountains and rivers, and (6) its present phenomena. What is this but evolution? Is it not a manifestation of changes from the lower to the higher, from the simple to the complex, and from the chaotic to the consolidated? The same principle is illustrated, as before indicated, by the science of embryology with its clearly marked stages of development—the fish, reptil, bird, quadruped, and, finally, the human form. The relationship of the species givs its proof in favor of the evolution theory. The different types of to-day had their one starting-point, the variations now seen having been produced by altered conditions. Moreover, we find that in the process of evolution some organs in animals become useless, while others change their use, thus proving that the animal kingdom possess structural affinities, and that subsequent classification depends upon the opportunity afforded for evolution. Then, again, the ability man has of diverting animal instincts and intelligence from their original sphere, as shown in the training of certain of the lower animals; of improving the eye as an optical instrument; of rendering less antagonistic the natures and instincts we discover in different species constantly at war with each other, all point to one process—that of evolution.

There is the old sentimental objection to this theory that it is humiliating to think that we hav evolved from forms lower down in the scale of animal life. But, as Dr. Page points out, there is nothing in this view necessarily degrading. "If in virtue of some yet unexplained process man has derived his descent from any of the lower orders, he is clearly not of them—his higher structural adaptations and improvable reason defining at once the specialty of his place, and the responsibility of his functions. It can be no degradation to hav descended from some antecedent form of life any more than it can be an exaltation to hav been fashioned directly from the dust of the earth. There can be nothing degrading or disgusting in the connection which nature has obviously established between all that livs, and those who employ such phrases must hav but a poor and by no means very reverent conception of the scheme of creation. The truth is there is nothing degrading in nature save that which, forgetful of its own functions, debases and degrades itself. The jibing and jeering at the idea of an 'ape-ancestry,' so often resorted to by the ignorant, has in reality no significance to the mind of the philosophic naturalist. There is evidently one structural plan running throughout the whole of vitality, after which its myriad members hav been ascensivly developed, just as there is one great material plan pervading the planetary system; and science merely seeks to unfold that plan, and to determin the principles upon which it is constructed. If there be no genetic connection between man and the order that stands next beneath him, there is at all events a marvelous similarity in structural organization, and this similarity is surely suggestiv of something more intimate than mere coincidence." Evolution, therefore, although unable to supply the solution to every problem presented to the student of nature, is, so far as can be discovered at the present day, the true theory of man and the universe, and is sufficient for all practical purposes. Further, it satisfies the intellect as no other theory does, and is assuredly more reasonable than that of special creation.

One question of great importance will probably suggest itself to those who hav given the theory of evolution much consideration. It is this: What is to be the position of things, and especially of man, in the future? Will there be evolved higher beings after him, as he is higher than those who preceded him? He stands now as the lord of creation; but so stood many mighty reptils of the past in their day and generation. Could they hav reasoned, would they not hav concluded that they were the final end of creation, and that all that had gone before was simply to prepare for their entrance into the world? In that they would hav erred; and, it may be asked, Shall we not equally err if we hastily decide that no higher being than man can ever come on earth—that he is and will ever remain the highest of organic existences? Now, the cases are not quite analogous, as a little reflection will show. The earlier animals were entirely the creatures of evolution; man is largely the director of the process. He can, by his intellect, control the law itself just as he bends gravitation to his will, though in a sense as much subject to its power as the earth on which he treads. Before man arose the animals and plants then existing were molded by the great power operating upon them from within and without, hence the form they took and the functions they performed. When they had to contend with an unfortunate environment they became modified; or, failing that, they disappeared. Now, man, by his mental force, can supply natural deficiences and thus not defeat evolution, but direct its current into a new channel. He can bring his food from a distance and thus avoid scarcity in the country where he dwells; he can successfully contend against climate, disease, and a thousand other destructiv agencies which might otherwise sweep him away. It is, therefore, no longer a contest between physical powers, but between physical and mental. No higher physical development is likely to occur, because it would not meet the case, since, however perfect it might be, it could not hold its own in the struggle for existence against man with his intellect. The development in the future must be one of mind, not of body. We do not consequently look forward to the time when organized beings, higher and more perfect physically than man, shall take his place on the earth; but we do believe that a period will arrive when the intellectual powers shall be refined, expanded, and exalted beyond anything of which at present we can hav any conception. The future of man is a topic of all-absorbing interest, and it needs no prophetic insight to enable us to form some dim and vague idea of what it will be. Mind will grapple with the great forces of nature, making them subservient to man's comfort and convenience. Virtue shall array herself more determined than ever against vice, ridding the world of its malignant power. Brother shall cease slaying brother at the command of kingly despots, and thus the world shall be crowned with the laurels of peace. Priestcraft shall lose its power over humanity, and mental liberty shall hav a new birth. The barriers of social caste shall be broken down and the brotherhood of man thereby consolidated. Woman shall no longer be a slave, but free in her own right. Capital and labor shall cease being antagonistic and shall be harmoniously employed to enrich the comforts and to augment the happiness of the race. Education shall supplant ignorance and justice take the place of oppression. Then the era shall hav arrived of which the philosopher has written and the poet has sung. Freedom shall be the watchword of man, reason shall reign supreme, and happiness prevail throughout the earth.

When from the lips of Truth one mighty breath
Shall, like a whirlwind, scatter in its breeze
The whole dark pile of human miseries.
Then shall the reign of mind commence on earth,
And starting forth, as from a second birth,
Man, in the sunrise of the world's new spring,
Shall walk transparent like some holy thing.

Divorce Laws in New Jersey.

New Jersey is a great state so far as her laws touching divorce are concerned. The laws regulating the relations between husband and wife are predicated on the rules and laws of nations that existed ages upon ages ago, in the Old World, when the husband used to yoke his wife and a donkey together to draw a crooked stick to till the land. In New Jersey a wife is the property of her husband just as much as his horse, mule, goat, and hogs are his property. The reader may smile at this declaration, but it is an incontrovertible fact that stands out in bold relief in all the laws of New Jersey that affect the interests or relations of husband and wife. When a man allows his daughter to marry a man in New Jersey, she immediately becomes the property of her husband. If she quits her home, the law requires her husband to go for her, as he would go for a stray animal, and try to induce her to go home and to remain there. The province of a wife in New Jersey is her husband's home. She must go and liv where her husband provides a home for her or take care of herself. Then, if her case is taken into the Court of Chancery (the only court that has any jurisdiction over divorces), her word, her explanations, her excuses, her affirmations in court, and her pleas will always hav greater influence and weight than anything her husband may state, for the reason that he is her lord, and she his property.

The law states plainly that "repeated refusals by a wife for three successiv years to liv in a home provided for her, in New Jersey, constitutes sufficient cause for a divorce."

Yet, after a wife has been as perverse and obstinate as she could be for three successiv years, and has not lived at home one day nor night for three years, and the husband commences suit for a divorce, if she pleads that she now wants to go home and liv with him, if he refuses to take her on his arm and go home with her, the law will adjudge him to be the deserter, and punish him accordingly.

A divorce case recently decided shows clearly what a miserable apology they hav in New Jersey for a divorce law. In 1876 a man and his wife (both good Presbyterians) owned a beautiful home in Bergen county, which cost them over $12,000, and it was all paid for. Besides this, the husband was receiving a salary, as an editor in New York city, of $60 per week, cash every Saturday. His interest from good notes and mortgages was over $2 per day. But she refused to liv with him unless he would discard THE TRUTH SEEKER. She quit home in 1877, and boarded at his expense about the country. He kicked and demurred at her bills, but always had them to pay. Domestic trouble preyed on his health so that he could no longer attend to the duties of his editorial position. So away went his $60 per week. His grown-up children persuaded him to sell his home, which he did, and lent them the money, and they spent it. In 1882 he accumulated enough to build a cheap cottage in Orange. Having furnished it nicely, he invited his kicking wife to come and liv with him. She came, but stated plainly that he must pay her $2 per week and discard THE TRUTH SEEKER, which he refused to do. She then ran him in debt $3,000 for a house and lot in East Orange, and demanded that he should allow her to take what furniture and household appliances she wanted and go and liv in her own home. He refused to allow any goods to be taken out of the house. When he was too ill to make his own bed, she employed three strong truckmen to move her goods, and went to the police station and got a platoon of armed police to go to her husband's house to intimidate him while the goods were being loaded. They took away every article of any value, and left the old man alone, with nothing but an old mattress and a few ragged bedclothes, not sufficient to keep a robust man warm. This occurred about April, 1883. She told her liege lord emphatically that "the Jersey laws are good for wives, and I intend to hav what I want, to go and come when I please, and you hav got to pay my bills."

He then consulted with many lawyers concerning a divorce. They all assured him he could not fail to get a divorce in a month or two, at longest. He directed a vestryman, in an Episcopal church, to sue for a divorce. She employed a lawyer; and the lawyers went in for making all the money they could out of the litigants. The lawyers hobnobbed, and chuckled, and played dice with the case, and kept drawing money, money, more money, until the old man had to sell his last little home for half-price to pay lawyers' fees, the costs of the court, and the wife's alimony.

In answer to her husband's bill for a divorce, on the ground of desertion, the lawyers induced her to plead that she had never deserted home, and was only away temporarily on a visit, and wanted to return and liv with her husband. As her husband refused to take his wife on his arm and go home, the court piled the alimony on him. He brought up a son and other witnesses to testify that he had no means of support, and that his health had been so poor for several years past that he could engage not in any regular business. He was then hauled up before the court and required to giv a full account of every dollar, and every note and document, good and bad, and to deliver them to a receiver. Prior to this, the court adjudged him to be able to work at some employment for three hundred days in a year, and to earn $300; and $104, the court said, must be paid to his wife.

The case was kept in court until July 30, 1886, when the vice-chancellor, seeing the money was gone, dismissed it without granting a divorce, and stated that the husband must pay all costs. The man stated that his money had all been extorted from him, his last little home had been sold to pay costs and debts, and his poor health would admit of but very little mental or manual employment. The only way he could pay, he said, was to go to Caldwell to the penitentiary and break stones with the rest of the wife-beaters, or be sent to Trenton and put on a striped suit. "Old Time" will reveal what will be done in the case.

The vice-chancellor, who is judge, jury, and the entire court, stated that "there was no question about the desertion." The wife deserted April 1, 1883, and had not lived with her husband since that date. But the bill of complaint lacked a few days of being three years old; hence, because the bill drawn up by the husband's lawyer was not quite three years old, the case must be dismissed. But the plucky old man declares that now he will get a divorce. He will be his own lawyer. There is one redeeming feature in the divorce laws, of which he will take advantage. The law provides that when a man is not worth one hundred dollars, clear estate, he can sue, per se, if he feels competent to manage his case, without costs. If he does not feel competent to conduct his case, the chancellor will assign competent counsel for him free of all costs. This man has already drawn up a new bill for a divorce, and says he will not now be hindered, and delayed, and stove off, and robbed of his money, by hobnobbing lawyers.

The writer has been informed by one who assumed to know that the chancellor, when they first met, directed the man to advance one hundred dollars as counsel fees to pay his wife's counsel. She had already paid him seventy-five dollars. Then one of the children (it was said) gave each lawyer one hundred dollars to manage the case in such a manner as to prevent a divorce. Besides the foregoing sums, the man was required to mortgage his little home to his lawyers to pay costs. The actual costs of the court and clerk amount to only a few dollars—less than ten. If the devil don't get such good Christian lawyers he ought to be turned out and another entrusted with his business who will carry it out with more efficiency.

All those parties, the man and his wife, the two lawyers, and the court, are professedly good and zealous Christians. Their proceedings in the court were instituted to prevent scandal and demoralization. The grand object of a divorce is to prevent demoralization in society. Let the reader contemplate for a few moments the scandal and demoralization incident to the career of that man and his wife since 1877—he a wreck, without money, without home, and without any means of support, while she is staying a few days here and a few days there, while both are thoroughly ostracised by relativs—and then let him judge whether or not New Jersey has not marvelous divorce laws! CRITICUS.

To Aid Mr. Reynolds and His Work.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav made an imperial-size photograph of Mr. Charles B. Reynolds which is considered an excellent likeness by those who hav seen it. One friend writes: "The portrait of Mr. Reynolds is superb; the most life-like and artistic picture I ever saw. The 'real presence' is in this picture." Through earnest solicitation I hav obtained Mr. Reynolds's consent to make this portrait a factor in the Freethought cause, and propose to sell copies (direct from the negativ) at fifty cents each, the proceeds to be given Mr. Reynolds to aid in the grand tent movement. I think every true Liberal, Freethinker, or Secularist will want a copy of this picture. These portraits will be offered for sale at the coming Convention, and copies will be sent, postage paid, to any address on receipt of price. C. F. DEMOTT.

Dissatisfaction Expressed.

Not long since, in a leading Boston daily, the following was among the regular death notices:

We cannot hav all things to please us,
Our little Georgia has gone to Jesus.

To the parents this may hav seemed proper. To the observer the implication that they would hav preferred the child to go somewhere else would, at least, seem one of the logical possibilities.—Profane Editor of the Christian Advocate.

News and Notes.

In spite of the tremendous efforts of the orthodox party, who engaged the opera house for the especial purpose of keeping people away from the Infidel meetings, our lectures at Seward were eminently successful. They resulted in the formation of a Secular Union, and a largely increased interest has been developed. Mr. H. L. Boyes has not much of age about him, although he has been in the Freethought ranks for over half a century. He is young yet in spirit, and believes in perpetual progress. He givs me greater faith than ever in the triumph of our cause. His wife, although not physically strong, sees still all the brightness of this world, and has the cheeriness of the springtime of life.

Mr. and Mrs. Maffitt are royal Liberals. They could not be anything else. It is impossible for orthodoxy to convert them. Freethought is in their very blood and bone. Mr. Maffitt is the founder of Seward, and has given over twenty thousand dollars for its advancement, and he has the pleasure of looking upon a beautiful city as the result of his efforts. He livs on a noble farm, just outside the city, ornamented with lovely groves, and rich with the garniture of harvest. The few days I spent here were a rest indeed, and I reveled in the glory of this prairie country, which, at this season of the year, is magnificently picturesque. Mr. Edward McIntyre, mayor of the city, introduced me at the lecture. He and I used to be together in the Green Mountain state. Then I was a pedagog fresh from my sophomore years, and I knew a great deal more then—I thought—than I do now, and I don't know but what I was happier in my blissful ignorance. Mrs. McIntyre was one of my scholars. Only think of it! I wonder how old I am. I don't believe I can guess, but it seems a long time ago since I was in that quaint little village, nestling so sweetly among the hills, where the moonlight nights were so brilliant, and the maidens so fair, and the squirrel hunts so fascinating, and the midnight suppers so gorgeous, and the debating club so animating, and the old, vast meeting house so solemn, and so decked with splendor when we put the theatric stage just where the melancholy pulpit used to be. O youth! glorious youth! don't desert me yet. Let the blood tingle just as joyously as it used to do, for I am still climbing the hights of life. I am not going down into the vale of years yet awhile.

Dr. and Mrs. Bumstead I found delightful friends. They hav some vague glimpses into spirit-land, but not enough to make this world less lovely and less grand. They are good Secular philosophers and poetic dwellers in this earthly sphere. They realize the ever-present beauty.

Many other noble and friendly Liberals I met, the leading business and professional men of the place—the Messrs. Roberts and Dunphy, Mr. C. Jones, I. M. Strayer, G. Babson, D. C. McKilup, W. D. Bowers; Mr. Marshall, of the Commercial House, who knows how to entertain the traveler; all these and others will make a gallant encampment of the Liberal legion, and we may expect honorable strife and merited victory.

From Seward the rattling train brings me to Valley Falls, Kansas, where Harman and Walker keep up the tug of war on "the ragged edge" of reform, and where the banners of Lucifer are given to the "god of storms, the lightning and the gales." I would that these determined combatants might join the central column that is sweeping on to such glorious victory, for surely they are trenchant warriors, and I would like to hav them in at the winning of the game and take their share of the triumphant feast. But they are bound to be of the "forlorn hope;" to fight on side issues which may or may not tend to the general progress. They mean to camp out constantly and hav no headquarters except in the saddle. Well, I can only giv them my heartiest blessing, and while I pursue a different course, which seems to me ideally and practically more for man's advancement, I will honor these splendid fighters and giv them the martyr's bay. Though they hav hard knocks instead of hard cash, I hope they will still enjoy the earthly paradise.

The majority of the Liberals of Valley Falls are in sympathy with the American Secular Union and its basis of work, the Nine Demands, and believe, as I believe, that on this line of battle the most useful triumphs can be achieved. Mr. N. H. Harman, Mr. John Reicherter and Mrs. Susan Reicherter—a grand worker indeeed—Mr. and Mrs. John Fisher, Mr. J. Earnst, Mr. S. Deutsch, Mr. J. Piazzek, Mr. J. R. Mitchell, Mr. Jones, Mr. Chris. Jorgensen, Dr. Senft, Mr. Frank Gregg, Mr. Backus, and others make really a predominant Secular element in the place, and I look forward to a strong organization in the future. Quite a number came from a distance to attend the lectures. Mr. Samuel Carter came from Mitchell county, a distance of one hundred and forty miles—an old worker in our cause, who added to the interest of the lectures by his addresses. Mr. Joel Grable came from Missouri, and has been a Liberal for over sixty years. Mr. T. H. Terry, a live Infidel, came from Bavaria, Kan. He wanted me for a week's campaign in his county, but I could not go, as my time is all occupied up to October 3d. Mr. Baldwin came from Kennebuk, Kan., and walked the whole distance, twenty-six miles. Where is the Christian who will do that nowadays? According to latest reports, the saints generally prefer to take the lightning express for Canada. Mr. Willetts, state lecturer for the Grange Association, came from McLouth, Kan. He is one of our ablest representativs in the state. He has been in the legislature, and is a prominent citizen. He says that Liberal thought prevails to a large extent in the Grange. Mr. T. P. Brinager came from Salem, Neb. His father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and keeps things lively in his part of the country. Thus we had a generous company together. The meetings were quite successful. The Opera House was well filled, although the churches kept their bells a-ringing all the time. I gave three lectures, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings, and one out-door lecture Friday afternoon on "American Democracy," and the importance of present work on the line of the Nine Demands. I hope to come to Valley Falls again. In every respect I had a pleasant and profitable time.

Saturday I was obliged to get up before sunrise and take my winding way to Seneca, Kansas, where I arrived in the afternoon, and was met by that genial worker and good Anglo-Saxon reformer, Mr. John Fuller, Sr., a fine, typical Englishman, and the kind I like to meet. He believes in doing something, and under his management the campaign at Seneca was a brilliant one indeed. There is a United Independent Society here, and it is one of the best Freethought organizations in the state. Mr. Fuller and his five boys, all Liberals, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Brooks, Mrs. Clark Smith, Mr. and Mrs. John Peckham, Mrs. John Smalley, and others constitute a live force that will hav a commanding influence in the community. Mrs. Brooks is from that big Liberal family, the Thayers, of Linesville, Pa., in which there are thirteen boys and girls—or men and women now—besides the father and mother. A few more such ample firesides of Liberalism, and we would fill the world with the glory of Freethought.

I gave two lectures at Seneca on Sunday, August 29th. About four hundred were present in the afternoon and six hundred in the evening. Axtell sent quite a delegation—Mr. Minor, the Messrs. Cone, and others, who hav formed quite a flourishing organization at Axtell, which is fourteen miles from Seneca. These are subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and its earnest supporters, and this shows that they are made of the right stuff, and will keep things a-going. Mrs. Brooks, Mrs. Smith, and others aided the lectures with good singing, and the whole campaign went off in ringing style. The orthodox were set all agog, and the next morning the streets were full of talk, and especially did the tide of battle rage around the "corner grocery." Christians found out that the world was moving on.

I was pleased to meet with Mr. Rodgers, the Universalist minister, who is quite a Liberal. I listened to one of his sermons, and it was full of advanced thought, and would not differ from what I myself might say if I were a radical Theist, after the manner of Savage or Chadwick. However, I am no Theist. So far as we hav any evidence, humanity is the grandest intelligence in the universe. I stick to the evidence, and not to faith. One can believe in God, but I can see no use in it, but rather, to a certain extent, a weakening of moral effort. Good, sound Atheism is the best intellectual and moral tonic one can hav. It is the basis of self-reliance. I won't quarrel with the Theist. Romance is good, and let those weave it who can.

I am now, Tuesday, August 31st, at the home of Mr. J. W. Scott, of Morrill. His son, Oliver Joseph Scott, died yesterday morning, and I remain to make the funeral address this afternoon. He was a young man of good promis; a faithful worker, a good Liberal. We stand at his grave, not with false hopes, but with that courage which comes from the sympathies and affections of humanity. Death is an evil—a terrible tragedy. It can be nothing else. An infinit love would never make it what it is. We learn, however, from the evil as well as the good. We derive moral power even from pain itself, and from the grave shall spring the flowers of sweet human sympathy; the generosity that will help the breaking heart; the affection that will minister with more willing hand; the beautiful spirit of love, that becomes more devoted as the disappointments of life become greater. It is our glory to conquer, not by prayer and faith, but by heroic action, the ills by which we are surrounded.

Mr. J. W. Scott is one of the oldest settlers in this country. He came here nearly thirty years ago. He has been an outspoken Freethinker and a generous supporter of our work. Our good friends, Jamieson and Remsburg, who hav lectured here, will remember his open-handed assistance and his pleasant home and family. To him and to his wife and children shall flow the tender sympathies of a thousand unseen friends, who throughout our ranks recognize the worth and share the sorrow of these noble fellow-workers, whose sublimest hope is the triumph of liberty and justice and the happiness of this world.

To the Liberals of Montana: I hope every Liberal in Montana will welcome and assist Mr. Jamieson in his proposed lecture tour through that territory. Now is the time to consolidate its Freethought forces. Arrange for lectures if possible. If any Liberal is so situated that he cannot do this—or attend lectures even—still let him show that he is a true Liberal by contributing to the general expense, and help others if he cannot help himself. Let there be a unity of purse as well as mind. Please communicate in this regard with Thomas Burke, Saylesville, Montana.

Lecture engagements: West Point, Neb., September 1st, 2d, 3d; Omaha, September 5th; Cromwell, Iowa, September 7th, 8th; Leon, September 9th, 10th; Ottumwa, September 12th; West Union, September 14th, 15th, 16th; Chicago, September 26th; Belding, Mich., September 28th, 29th; West Union, Ohio, October 1st, 2d, 3d.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Morrill, Kan., Aug. 31, 1886.

Call for the Tenth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Tenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held in New York city, at Chickering Hall, Fifth avenue and 18th street, on November 11th, 12th, and 13th, and also on Sunday evening, the 14th, a lecture by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which concludes the Congress.

Pursuant to a vote of the last Congress, notice is hereby given that the following amendments to the constitution of the Union will be acted upon: 1. To reduce the fee for life-membership from $25 to $10. 2. Or, on payment of $10 by applicant for membership, to authorize the secretary to issue ten-year membership certificates, with all the privileges of life-membership during that time. 3. Whenever a man or woman has taken out annual membership certificates for three or five consecutiv years, such person thereafter on payment of annual-membership fee to possess the privilege of life-membership.

The Congress will also be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute-books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the president and secretary and three delegates. All charter-members and life-members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executiv committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present.

Per order of board of directors:

R. G. Ingersoll, President.
Samuel P. Putnam, Secretary.
Courtlandt Palmer, Treasurer.
Charles B. Reynolds, Ch. Ex. Com.
E. M. Macdonald, Ch. Fin. Com.

Canadian Notes.

Sunday evening, Aug. 28th, was, on account of the extreme heat, considered rather a bad night for an opening lecture, but, notwithstanding the atmosphereful state of the weather, Science Hall was filled to the doors to hear Mr. Watts deliver the first lecture of the season. This was Mr. Watts's first appearance in public since his return from England, and he received a right hearty welcome from the audience, who greeted his appearance on the platform in a manner which proved his ever-growing popularity among Toronto Liberals.

His lecture, "Secularism—Past, Present, and Future," was, as usual, a masterpiece of oratory and unanswerable logic, and that it was fully appreciated is shown by the fact that not one of the sweltering audience left the hall during the hour and a half of its delivery.

On the following evening, Monday, Aug. 29th, Mr. Watts lectured again, subject, "Gladstone's Defeat and the Irish Question," and I venture to say that had he delivered that lecture at the late convention of the Irish National League in Chicago, he would to-day be one of the most popular men in [illegible] has given in Toronto on the Irish question; and while all who hav heard them agree that they are the best they hav ever listened to on this subject, yet the priests and ministers here hav the power to keep from attending the very people who would be most benefited by hearing them.

The audience though small was appreciativ, the applause and enthusiasm being unlimited. At the close of the lecture the secretary of the Toronto branch of the Irish National League, in a few eloquent remarks—during which he expressed the wish that every lover of religious and political liberty in Canada could hear the eloquent and instructiv lecture he had just listened to—moved a hearty vote of thanks, which was carried with cheers. I could not help comparing Mr. Watts's grand plea for "reason, toleration, and intellectual rather than physical force" with the action of some of the parson bigots in Toronto, and the Rev. Dr. Kane, of Belfast, whose name should be spelled "Cain," and who, from all accounts, is responsible for much of the bloodshed there during the past few weeks.

The Rev. Dr. "Wild" drives the bigoted Orangemen "wild" by offering to lead a regiment into Belfast to butcher the Catholics. The Rev. Dr. Potts volunteers as a captain in the same regiment, and preaches to the "Prentiss Boys" "to be ready for any emergency and stand fast in the faith." And so they drive their horrible trade, while Mr. Watts and other (so-called) Infidels, Secularists, and Agnostics plead for reason, education, and intellectual force.

If the above should meet the eyes of the Toronto Masons, who lately expelled a brother for being an Infidel, Secularist, and Agnostic, I hope they will make a note of it, and oblige Kanuck.

Rum and Missionaries.

Among the religious items in a weekly journal devoted to missionary news occurs the following: "Sailed for Africa, Rev. R. S. Simpson, missionary," and as a part of the cargo were mentioned one hundred thousand dollars' worth of New England rum! The missionary was also well provided with "revised versions," and attractiv tracts. Rum and religion hav always gone hand in hand in orthodox New England, and they hav carried it into Africa. It is a well established fact that one pint of New England rum will convert a negro quicker than the entire extract of all the camp-meetings ever held. Besides, its spiritual nature is well adapted to the African's needs.

When Mohammed went on a missionary trip he carried the sword in one hand, and the Koran in the other. He made short work of the Infidel who refused to believe. The result was satisfactory, and converts came in by the thousand. Now, this was the Mohammedan way, but the New England Christians can discount them in a more spiritual way. They take a revised version in one hand, and a demijohn in the other, and if one doesn't bring the nigger over to Jesus, why, the other does.

This is an old trick of the New England Christians. One hundred years ago they use to freight their ships with missionaries on deck, and Medford rum, tobacco, and Bibles in the hold. These ships would sail regularly from Boston, Salem, and Beverly, but on the return trip would deliver a cargo of Guinea humanity in Virginia or South Carolina ports in order that they might be Christianized under the lash and spur. Thus rum, tobacco, Bibles, Christianity, and niggers were made profitable all around. Then there was another consoling thought. As soon as the poor darkies had learned the beauties of religion, and had the devil whipped and spurred out of them, they were transferred to the arms of Jesus, when otherwise they would hav been damned certain.

The fact is that Infidels know but little of the real beauties of New England Christianity, and less of the virtues of their rum. There are thousands of deluded heathen all over the West and South who would willingly be converted by a quart of old Medford rum, which would put more spirits into them in five minutes than could be preached in in ten years. But this would not do. It would materially interfere with the comfortable salaries paid to secretaries, clerks, and religious printers who enjoy life in New York, at the expense of the simple faithful of our churches. It is well known that out of every dollar given for missionary purposes, ninty-nine cents is spent in New York.

Now, if they would only stop this expensiv business, and establish a distillery in every parish, set the minister at work on the mash tubs, with the deacons at the furnaces, they could turn out holy rum enough to convert the world in less than a year. Whereas by the present system they are sending the heathen to sheol by the wholesale, and at a cost of thousands of dollars for every soul sent to the burning. It is now a settled dogma with the improved Christians of the present day that the heathen who hav never heard of Christ are finally saved. Then why don't they call off their Christian hounds, who, by yelling Christ at them, send them all to sheol? Oh, what a comforting thing is religion! The poor, deluded Infidels in our degenerate and fallen state can never fully appreciate it. We must hav a revised version, the grace of god—I spell it with a small g—and a quart of sanctified New England rum, to understand it.

The missionary system has its good points, after all, for it rids us of a lot of incapables who hav not brains enough to be anything at home. It is a pleasant excursion to Africa and other heathen lands; besides, hareems are easier kept there than here, and the women are not so particular. We know scores of ministers who could be got rid of to advantage if they could be fitted out with $100,000 worth of New England rum. Well, let the good work go on, but we would advise the societies to stop the big salaries. Send out fewer missionaries and more New England rum, and the entire heathen world will be found around the communion-table in less time than it takes to save an ordinary soul, as things go now. T.

Our Theory Questioned.

The Truth Seeker says it was not a serpent that tempted Eve, but a "minister of the gospel." We find this item in the Hebrew Standard. We want the proof before we will believe the assertion. We think there were no preachers in heaven then, and we doubt if there are any now.—Jewish Times.

New Light in Iowa.

"The Truth Seeker, a journal of Freethought and reform," published in New York, reached our sanctum this week. It strongly advocates Freethought, denounces religious intolerance, ridicules superstition, and is altogether a spicy, readable paper. It would at first shock the average reader, but it would be a good thing for civilization if it was in general circulation throughout this country.—New Hampton Tribune.

A Difference of Opinion.

A clerical gentleman in this city stated recently in a sermon that a man who didn't believe in God was either "an infamous liar or an infamous (!) fool." The dispatches from England tell us that the Atheist, Charles Bradlaugh, has just been returned to Parliament from Northampton by a large majority, and is, in truth, the only candidate who polled more votes than at the last election.—Denison Gazetteer.

The Apostle of Liberty.

John E. Remsburg delivered his address on "The Apostle of Liberty," Thomas Paine, on Tuesday evening, in the park. The night was exceedingly hot, but an audience of between one hundred and two hundred listened with attention. The address was remarkable for choice language—a style at once perspicuous and ornate—an overwhelming array of facts—and was delivered with the rich voice and quiet power of an orator. It settles the matter, so far as facts can settle it, that Thomas Paine furnished the ideas and inspiration of the Revolutionary period; that he first suggested independence, and that he was one of the purest and best men that the cause of human liberty ever developed.—Worthington (Minn.) Advance.

Editorial Notes.

It is a queer thing that the Christians of Charleston, after their houses of worship had been damaged by the earthquake to the extent of a million dollars, should hav assembled in the streets last Sunday by the thousands to worship "God." If they can worship the being who, according to their own profession of belief, has sent this great affliction upon them, what reasonable objection could they hav to worshiping the devil? But there is no accounting for the acts of people when once superstition has got hold of them.

When something atrocious is wanted, turn to the religious press. The Advocate, for instance, says:

"It is well they killed the police. Not that the police should be killed; but killing them made all the police in the United States the deadly foes of Anarchists."

By parity of reasoning, it is well that they crucified Christ. Not that Christs should be crucified, but crucifying him made all Christians the deadly enemies of the Jews, and the Jews, therefore, may be justly persecuted to the end of time. Is that your meaning, Brother Buckley?

"New Glasgow, N. S., Sept. 1, 1886.

"To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I think you will confer a favor on many of your readers if you will watch the religious journals, and tell us from time to time what they say (if anything) about the Reynolds blasphemy case—the leading journals, I mean. I, for one, would like to know their attitude toward the matter. F. M. Borden."

We share our correspondent's curiosity to know what the religious editors think of the case of Mr. Reynolds, but that curiosity has not been gratified. Apparently they hav not as yet heard of it. At the same time we are kept apprised of the progress of Christianity in China, and the Methodist million for foreign missions is booming.

One of the methods of keeping her people in proper subjection employed by the Roman Catholic church comes out through a disagreement between two priests of Detroit. One priest had reason to believe that another priest had inspired an article concerning the first priest in a Detroit morning paper, which was considered libelous. The first priest thereupon instructed a lawyer to sue the second priest. The lawyer, being a good Catholic, notified the second priest that he was to be sued. The second priest answered that if suit was brought the first priest and the lawyer would both be excommunicated. This threat made the first priest angry, and he ordered the lawyer to begin proceedings right away. Regarding the case the lawyer said to a reporter: "I hav looked into the question of the threats, and don't think they are well founded. Until a few years ago it was considered a bad thing to sue a priest in a civil court. Such cases were usually relegated to ecclesiastical tribunals, and kept secret. You probably remember the case of Blindbury, in Kalamazoo, who was excommunicated for suing Bishop Borgess. Blindbury was, or had been, a good Catholic, and the shock of the excommunication proved too much for him. He died soon afterward. The question was then discussed, and it came to be acknowledged, I believe, that a Catholic could sue his priest, or even higher authorities, in civic courts. Anyhow, the thing has been done since repeatedly, and no excommunications followed." The second priest claims that the recent plenary council at Baltimore made a ruling on the subject, and restored the old penalty. If this is so, the only way for a Catholic to get redress for wrongs done him by a priest is to first disabuse his own mind of the notion that excommunication amounts to anything. But the claim of the priest shows very plainly why more of the priestly rascalities are not brought to public notice.

A correspondent sends us the following clipping from the Middletown, N. Y., Argus:

"A gentleman residing in Middletown, who was visiting in Sullivan county last week, was attracted by eight headstones in a little grass-grown cemetery, near Fallsburgh, all of which stood in a row and were exactly alike. He got out of his wagon to look at them, and found that they were all children of a well-known physician, and that all were grown when stricken down, and that the dates on the headstones showed that the first one died Nov. 23, 1861, and the other seven between that date and Dec. 15th, following, or that the entire family of eight children had died within eight weeks. When speaking of the matter to friends that day, he was told the history of the case, which is regarded in that neighborhood as a visitation of Providence in punishment of defiance of the deity. The story as told is that in 1861 there was a scourge of diphtheria in that neighborhood, and the physician was kept busy treating patients suffering from that disease. He was very successful, and gained such confidence in his skill that he began to boast that he could cure any case, and went so far that he 'defied God Almighty to produce a case of diphtheria he could not cure.' In less than a week his youngest child was seized with the disease, and although he exercised his skill to the utmost, having not only professional pride but a father's love to urge him to do his best, his boy grew worse and died. One after another his children sickened and died, until all were gone, and laid side by side in the little graveyard near Fallsburgh. But one child was left, a married daughter; but in a few weeks she, too, was stricken down and became a victim to the dread disease."

Referring to the above our correspondent asks: "How do you account for such publications? What is the philosophy involved?" In the first place, we take the risk of saying that the story is not true—at least, so far as the deaths following from the physician's careless remark is concerned. It is not the business of unbelievers to explain or investigate such libels as this upon the deity. Let those who believe in an overruling providence, whom they worship, attend to that task. As for ourselvs, we wish it put upon record to our credit that we hav never believed in nor worshiped a being who would be guilty of taking the lives of innocent children for anything which their parents may hav said, and merely as an exhibition of his power. An act like that would disgrace the record of a pirate. We account for such publications on the theory that prevaricators are not all dead. The philosophy involved is that the majority of these surviving prevaricators are of a religious turn of mind.

Idling Again.

My Dear Brother: When your eye falls upon these lines you will recall that I obtained a few days' vacation this year on condition that the vacation was to end when I got back, and that I was not to ask for space in two or three issues of the paper to talk about idle days, and other things of that sort. Idle days, you remarked, did well enough for a season or two, but grew monotonous at last to those searching for variety. But you forgot that immediately upon my return you were to go away to the State Convention, and that during your absence I was to run things according to my ideal of how a great newspaper should be conducted. If I work in a few words and get them printed while you are absent it is beyond the capacity of my poor weak understanding to see how anything can be done about it. Leaving that for your consideration when you get home, I will proceed with the main proposition.

There were three places which held out attractions for me this year. The first was Aroostook county, Maine. I wanted to go there. It is a handsome country, and I thought when I was there two years ago that if the Lord had happened to get his eye on Aroostook county in season he never would hav picked out Palestine as his chosen land. But Aroostook was so far away, and time was so short, I had to giv it up.

The second place was a lake resort in Pennsylvania. My friend, Counsellor Sherman, wanted me to go there. He represented that the shores of the lake were lined with nymphs from the surrounding country, that males were very scarce there, and that a practical monopoly of female beauty awaited a young man from New York. I thought some of going, as you will recollect that I was advised to do by Mr. Somerby, who remarked casually that he wouldn't mind taking it in himself. But from this vision I turned aside, and one day when I had a little leisure time I flung a few things into my old gripsack, and bought a ticket for Keene, New Hampshire, and the scenes of my childhood, which, I may here remark, are still dear to my heart. I went by way of boat to New London—the same old boat, and, it seems to me, the same old crowd of passengers. Here, for instance, is the woman with the squalling infant who reaches for the cane of the nearest male passenger, and calls him pa, to the great distress of the mother. Then there is the man in a tall white hat with a weed on it. His hair is long and turns under at the end. He has some sort of pass instead of a ticket. He wears a watch chain, but it is safe to bet dollars against doughnuts that he can't tell the time of day. There is no watch on the end of the chain. Then here is the newly-married couple who sit and gaze at each other with dreamy, watery eyes, and yawn. Havn't had sleep enough. Then there is the woman with the five-year-old boy who wants to know what everything is "for." If I had to travel with such a boy I should turn a large barrel over him and sit on it.

I slept that night to the music of the thumping engin and fiendish deck-hands chasing one another about with trucks. When the engin stopped at New London and the deck-hands had ended their revels, the steward came and banged on my door with a club and told me to get ready for the train. I adopted his suggestion, but the train didn't get ready for me for about an hour. There is a daily paper or two published at New London. To encourage the enterprise I purchased a copy of the Telegraph, and was much entertained by reading in the column of locals that Captain So-and-so, of the yacht Hornet, would take a party of ladies out that day for a "sale." The editor predicted an enjoyable occasion. I should say so. The paper also contained a poem written especially for its columns. I giv you a stanza of it:

> Oh, how the entire city did gloat
> Over Osprey, dear Osprey, cool Osprey,
> And when there came an excursion boat,
> How all the people down there would float,
> Right down towards Osprey, gay Osprey.

In the early morning we went scooting along through Connecticut. The scenery consisted of wire fence and fog, with occasional patches of water, in which floated some neglected rowboats half filled. I called it pretty dismal. The road runs along the Connecticut river, which does a lively business turning water-wheels. It is dammed up and run through a flume wherever the site seems to be worth a dam, so to speak. Where the banks are high these dam-sites are frequent. I write thus without intending to be profane.

We passed by Lake Pleasant, Mass., where the Spiritualists hav a camp-meeting all summer. Quite a number of good-looking passengers got off there. I did not see the lake nor the camp, but I saw a lot of wooden steps and a plank walk that leads off over the hill to them. Somewhere along in the town of Winchester, N. H., the train stopped and the conductor announced "Forest Lake." I looked out. A pair of bars down were the only visible signs of a station. I asked the conductor where the forest and the lake were, and he explained that Forest Lake was the sheet of water down there in the woods. They used to call it Humphrey's Pond. The people up there are developing a weakness for something hifalutin in names. "Sylvan Glade" is the sign stuck up in one place where it looks as if a picnic might be possible. Then away up in the godforsaken town of Marlow there is, near the highway, a section of howling wilderness, whose natural wildness is somewhat saddened by the presence of some mournful-looking seats. This picture of desolation is called "Edgewood," which givs the thing a sort of English turn, as it were.

When I arrived at Keene I found the vicinity torn by an excursion which had recently been made from there to Saratoga Springs. The railroad company put the fare away down, and the people responded nobly. If there is a resident of Saratoga within sound of my voice, he must remember the day. Everybody I met had either been on the excursion or was darned glad he didn't go. Those who went were packed into the cars like cigars in a box, and rushed off to Saratoga and back with only time to get a drink of spring water. I heard some severe criticisms of the taste of Saratoga spring water. They said there was the flavor of old feet about it, and it was judged that ordinary well water drunk from a rubber boot in hot weather would go about as good.

I hav been stopping most of the time up in Surry, close by the school-house where I went to meeting last year. I learned that the elder who conducted the services on that occasion has read my report of the same and don't like it. I saw others who said it "touched him off just right." A revival is now in progress at the school-house, which building bids fair to lose its identity as an educational institution, and to be given up to the service of superstition. I did not attend meeting. There was no need of it. The parson was good enough to shout so he could be heard for half a mile. The sect doing business there is the Christian, which, I suppose, is the same as the Campbellite. What interested me most about this church is the deacon. I knew him nearly twenty years ago. He was a wild coot then, and showed none of the distinguishing characteristics of a deacon. He seemed more inclined to swap horses than to do anything else. I never heard anything against his honesty, but he had the reputation of being pretty "s'rewd." I worked with him one summer haying, and by listening to him attentivly I learned to swear in quite an artistic manner for one so young. He gathered things around him—a family among the rest—and three years ago I found him located on a farm near our old home, settled down steady as a clock, knocking pennies and dollars, in a moderate way, out of whatever he turned his hand to. A year ago I learned that he had been converted, given his heart to Christ, and subscribed for a religious paper. It is worth something to see him struggling with that religious paper Sunday mornings. I imagin he is not much of a theologian, and I guess he doesn't gather ideas so fast from printed matter as he would if they were spoken. His house is now the rendezvous for all the pious beats in the vicinity, and I couldn't help feeling for him. I am interested to see whether his piety is going to bring him any more prosperity than he enjoyed before, whether people are going to respect him any more, or how it will be. He is rather sharp, and my notion is that he won't invest any more in the business than he believes to be necessary. Further, he is gifted with a large amount of cautiousness. He sees his buildings in flames if anybody lights a pipe in the neighborhood. He is insured to cover all such possible catastrophes, and I suppose that when the preachers came around and talked about worms and everlasting fire, and other unquenchable things, he got a little shaky and thought he would cast an anchor to windward. He is religious on strictly business principles. I am going to watch this deacon and report on him from year to year. There may be hope for him yet.

The man on whose premises I "lazed around" does not go to church. He makes no profession of religion, and has only that faith in Christ which one man of good intentions has in another. I believe that if Christ were a resident of Surry the confidence would be reciprocal, which is more than can be said of all who call upon his name.

The prayer-meeting does not meet with any encouragement in this district. There was one called at the deacon's the other evening. The minister started to attend, but never got there. He avows in explanation that the devil met him on the road and turned him back, which is undoubtedly a lie. Those who got there had a warm time, but a young man and woman riding home drove off a bank and came near breaking their necks. It is thought that the young man will be unable to turn over in bed until his father finds out whether the town is going to pay damages or not. Quite a number of those who attended the prayer-meeting rushed to the scene of the accident, and it is reported that when some one called for whisky for the sufferer, numerous bottles of it were produced with surprising alacrity. I don't believe the revival is doing any good, for some of the time I was there the heat of the weather suggested that hades was as near the top of the ground as ever.

While in New Hampshire I met your young son, and for a night or two fortune brought us to occupy the same bed. I thought at the time, and since, that maybe King Herod had to sleep with his nephew, which would account for the prejudice he held against children, and if so I am ready to be charitable. We should not judge men too hastily without acquainting ourselvs with surrounding circumstances. Perhaps King Herod is a very much misrepresented historical character.

I liked the looks of New Hampshire this year better than ever before. The farms were greener, the barns were fuller than last year; people appeared more cheerful. I got the same horse and carriage I had in other years. The carriage rode easier, and the old horse had grown more contemplativ. He is a thoughtful beast. Going up-hill he stopped often to think, and having come to a conclusion, he would take a long breath and go on again. I imagined it took him longer to make up his mind than previously. His forelegs hav got sprung a little out of perpendicular. I should say they would fit pretty closely the inside of a barrel stave. His appetite, I was gratified to observe, remained unimpaired. I gave him his own way, and the spider spun his web undisturbed between the whip and the dashboard. When I took the horse back to the owner, and paid for the use of him about what he would sell for, it gave me food for thought to hear the owner say that old Billy was in better condition than when I took him out. I wondered how much money I could make taking other people's horses and fattening them.

Perhaps you would like to know if I rode about alone all this time. I don't mind telling you that I didn't. In 1876, in writing of my vacation, I had some complimentary words to say about the New Hampshire girls. I was a boy at that time, but I can point with pride to the verdict then delivered. It is pleasing to thus be able in maturer years to look back with approval upon the judgments of our youth.

I engaged in no religious discussions this year. I met but one theologian, and he declined to outline his system of theology in any intelligible way, but I made it out that he deprecated the methods of preaching now in vogue. There were four exponents of what he denominated "this ere poppiler, carnal, hippicritical, blasphemin' preachin'" toward whom he expressed a particular aversion. The first was "this ere Foster over in Westmoreland;" second, Henry Ward Beecher, of New York; third, the man who preached in the adjacent school-house, surnamed Eaton; and, again, "this ere Robert Ingersoll." He complained that these three preachers "add to and take from" the scriptures in a scandalous manner, and that their only desire is to draw large audiences. It was the revision of the Old and New Testaments that had played the mischief with Christianity, and he was ready to giv the world its head and let it go to the devil. Other people wouldn't listen to his preaching, and he wouldn't listen to theirs. Having thus delivered himself, my friend slapped his leg and laughed uproariously. That was all I could get out of him.

Denman Thompson, the actor who plays Josh Whitcomb, livs about seven or eight miles from Keene. He played his new piece, "The Old Homestead," in Keene while I was there, and I went to see him. It seemed rather superfluous to bring a character like Josh Whitcomb into that neighborhood. The woods are full of them. There were just as good Joshes in the audience as the one on the stage, and Thompson's funniest sayings were household words to them. When Uncle Josh pulled off his cowhides in the parlor of his New York friend, and squinted lengthwise them from heel to toe, with the remark that there was some "darned good leather in them boots," it need not hav struck the New Hampshire man as odd. He is likely to do and say the same thing himself any day.

I hav not told you much about my personal doings on this vacation, because I hav done nothing in which anyone but myself could take an interest. I hav idled away the time as I meant to do. I sat under the old apple-tree in the dooryard, where we used to roll about when we were boys. The tree is dead and furnishes hardly any shade; so I sat in the sun and watched the summer clouds go over, like ships sailing in the sky. The old times came back, and old familiar faces clustered around, and I saw them best with closed eyes. The hum of bees and drone of vagrant flies sounded now as then, and with their music came memories, floating, drifting, appearing and disappearing, like things seen through a glass reversed, distant but distinct. Thus I saw my friends not only as they are now, but as I knew them then; not only those who still walk the earth, but those who hav sunk back to that dreamless sleep from which they first awakened on this life. So under the old apple-tree I dozed and dreamed till the days of my vacation slipped by and work called me back to New York. Here I am once more in the swim, among the types, and the wads of manuscript, and the piles of papers. The world turns slowly again, and the days that hav been so short of late hav resumed their accustomed length. I hope all your readers hav enjoyed a vacation as pleasant, and that when it was ended they dropped back to a work as congenial to them as mine is to me.

The Unequal Contest.

It will be noticed that the writers of the new books which deal with the labor problem all agree that the state, its laws, and the enforcement thereof, hav much to do with the solution of the knotty problem of labor.

That they are right in this assumption there is not the slightest doubt. Some faint idea of the disadvantage and disproportion of the conflict between capital and the just rights of the employed may be gathered from the following: On one side we hav laborers presenting their grievances and asking for relief, with nothing but justice to sustain them. On the other side we hav, first, the colossal money-kings with a power approaching the miraculous; second, their envious followers, not possessing so much, but bending every energy to reach the size of their "piles;" third, the well-to-do wage-workers, whose salaries are good, labor light, and who, as they see no cause to complain, oppose complaints from others; fifth, the "stability of society," which, dreading a revolutionary shock, is firmly opposed to a radical change in anything; sixth, the opposition of the church. We may as well say it first as last, the colossal money-kings use the other five objectors as fencing sticks to keep labor just where it is—namely, in bondage. To their followers just at their heels they turn and say: "If you want to reach us in importance and riches, you must deal with labor with an iron hand, for it is from labor that we get all we hav, or ever expect to hav. Be sure that they do not get justice, for if they should they might hav some of it to spare for us, and we hav not, nor never did hav, any use for that commodity." To the satisfied wage-workers they hold up the dread of dismissal. To the "stability of society" they direct their newspapers to hold up the awful horror of a state of Communism; to enlarge upon, to misrepresent, to exaggerate, the utterances of every friend of labor; to bundle them all up in one package, and, labeling it Anarchistic, denounce them all as enemies to the well-being of society, and highly revolutionary and dangerous. To the kid-gloved and perfumed darlings of the church, cultured, ascetic gentlemen who trade in goodness at so much per year, they issue directions that sermons on the subject of the "Divine Will," in which it is clearly set forth that the condition of the workingmen at the present day is the will of almighty God, should be more frequently preached. Also anathema and threats of excommunication against those who join secret societies or associations. The above orders are faithfully executed and payments for such services promptly made, and everybody except the poor workingman is supremely happy.

To the ignorant masses the word of the church is a command from God, and, no matter how unreasonable nor how hurtful it may be to their interests, they will follow it. But not all, as we hav reason to believe.

The recent edict of the Catholic church against the Knights of Labor may open the eyes of thousands to a fact that people hav failed to see for centuries—namely, that all churches, Catholic or Protestant, are hand in glove with moneyocracy. One of the cardinal creeds of all churches—that of a heavenly recompense for the ills, suffering, and poverty of this life—is of itself enough to indict the whole scheme as a bugaboo, originating in the cunning brain of the "governing class." With not a particle of common sense, much less reason, in them, religions and their creeds hav been rammed down the throats of the people for ages. They hav been liberally supported, for they dealt with a subject that no one ever really knew anything about, and as they claimed they had a revelation from God on the subject, thousands, too lazy or too incapable of thinking about its credibility, accepted it as such, joined the church, and secured a ticket for heaven. This, of course, in itself is but a harmless myth; but when the church leaves its legitimate business of dealing in futures, and arrogates the right to command its followers to do that which is directly contrary to their physical, mental, and moral well-being, then it's about time to face about and say to the church, Who and what are you, anyhow? It is safe to say that to a reasonable inquirer its reply will be very lame and wonderfully impotent.

Based upon the lowest superstitions of the ignorant in the remote ages, it has been enlarged, modernized, and added to as occasion required, but, still adhering to its baseless fabrications, it should be swept away as any old rotten lumber is in the erection of a new and better edifice. So long as it confined itself to singing lullabies to good old ladies, and telling fibs over the remains of its dead members, so long as it was a convenient refuge for the physically weak and not mentally strong members of our families, where they could earn an easy living preaching milk-and-water sermons to admiring congregations, why, we make no objection to it—quite a harmless diversion, the same as any other amusement. But when it turns around and says that we shall blindly allow injustice and wrong to be heaped upon us and take a draft payable after death in payment for it, then I think it is about time to snatch off its veil, as the veil of the Great Mokanna was lifted, and show the world what a hideous, rotten humbug it is. Let the church of Rome remember this is the nineteenth century, that the people are becoming more enlightened every day, and that its interference in matters pertaining to labor and with the Knights of Labor may be one of the very worst moves it ever made. The Knights of Labor hav nothing to do with religion—the order was formed to protect the rights of its members from the unjust encroachments of monoply and greed. And that a church who professes to hav the welfare of its members at heart should take sides with its bitterest foe ought to be reason enough for a wholesale exodus from that church. Stand by your order. God will never punish a man for doing right.

WM. ALLEN SMITH.

Mixed Pickles.

It is said that a deacon of a Greenville, Pa., church has a string of buttons a yard long, said buttons having been "chipped in" to the contribution-box at various times by the devout parishioners. I don't doubt this story at all. Neither do I doubt that, when members chipped in a button or buttons, they chipped in full value for all they received spiritually, and had they chipped them in as buttons no fault could hav been found with them justly; but they chipped them in as so many shekels, the hypocrits.

Many a deacon, if of long standing, can tell a similar story, I guess, button-giving Christians (?) being far plentier than angels' visits, in my opinion. While posing as "cheerful givers" to the church, they bamboozle the Lord with buttons, many of which, no doubt, are iron, which is fairly running the iron into the soul of the Lord, as I look at it. If the aggregate of buttons is not what it should be—I mean what it might be—what a story the pie-plates, hats, and boxes could tell of brummagem coins and "queer" notes, eh? The deacons wouldn't "giv it away," probably, but there is no doubt that the church contribution-box is a great place for the "shoving of the queer" and the getting rid of bogus, sweated, and mutilated coins. If the getting of the "queer" into these receptacles was the last of it, it would be well and good, and that all the "queer" might get there to stay would be a consummation devoutly to be wished; but I hav no better opinion of the average deacon than to think he would send it on its way again with the specious argument that he doesn't know it is bad. If I wrong the average deacon, I am willing to be forgiven by him.

A weekly is to be started in London to be called the Earth. Its mission is to prove, if it can, that the earth is flat and stationary, and not round and revolving according to the "pagan fictions of Kepler and Newton," so largely and alarmingly accepted by the people of the earth. We read in the Bible of the "pillars and foundations of the earth," and those who take their Bible straight can't see where said "pillars and foundations" come in with a round and whirling earth, you know. The society which is to publish this hebdomadal is of this class, and is now begging "those who love their Bibles" to chip in each a few shillings monthly to help the thing along. Doubtless the shekels will be forthcoming, with more or less buttons, and we shall soon see what we shall see in the way of proof in the direction mentioned. I hav no doubt that the first number will prove the Earth to be "flat." Anyhow, it should be welcomed, as we shall then be able to find many more people who do not "want the Earth" than we can find at present.

"Riots in Belfast, Ireland." Thus the press styles the fights in the Irish city. Rioting, eh? Why, it is almost up to the dignity of civil war—quite up to the implacability of religious war. Yes, the citizens of the Irish city are engaged in a religious war, shooting, stoning, and clubbing one another to death for Jesus's sake! Catholics murdering Protestants, Protestants murdering Catholics, for the love of God! Religious history from the days of the way-back repeating itself. Never since the aforesaid days were religious combatants more bitter, relentless, and ruthless than the warring Irishmen of to-day. Figurativly it is war to the knife and the knife to the hilt. I say figurativly, guns and stones being the weapons used instead of knives. But the intent is the same. With guns and stones they fight to the death, if possible, which it too often is, and all for the sake of Jesus! Men, women, and children are shot down because they are Catholics. Men, women, and children stoned to death because they are Protestants! And this murder most foul religionists hav been doing ever since religion first came into the world to curse the world, and, I suppose, it will be done until the religion of superstition giv way to the religion of humanity. When that time comes the millennium will hav come, and the world up from and out of the slough of superstition will go on its way rejoicing, led by progress, which has been fettered ever since pagan Rome went over to Christianity.

John Wilberforce Kennion is dead. J. W. K. was a preacher of the "gospel" whose church was the highway. His audiences were composed of bums, hoodlums, and les miserables of both sexes. His church in the open, with his tatterdemalion congregations, he would not hav exchanged for the most imposing "sacred" edifice in Christendom, with its fashionable worshipers in purple and fine linen. The "gospel" with him was the gospel practical. He fed his listeners, who oftentimes were suffering from hunger. He took miserable wretches by the hand and called them brothers. In every way possible would he try to befriend them, and his ways were the most practical of all ways. His gospel was not, "Ask from on high and ye shall receive," "Repent or ye will be damned!" That was not his gospel at all. His gospel was, "Come up here, brothers and sisters who are hungry, and take hold of this bread and coffee. There is plenty, and you are welcome. Eat and fill yourselvs!" That was Kennion's gospel, but not the whole of it. After they had fed he would giv them some of the sensible precepts of the Bible—old, however, before the latter book was collated by priests—and then go round among them and assure them that he would do all in his power for those who would try to be men and women, meaning what he said, too; and many a one has he helped from the gutter, where rum had formerly sent him. Is there a fashionable preacher of the gospel in this wide, wide world, presiding over a gilded congregation, that would do as John W. Kennion did? Not one, for ducats—not one! Hypocrits and Pharisees as they are, in toto, how much less as a man is any picked one of them than was John W. Kennion! I don't believe that Kennion was any more imbued with Bible doctrins than I am, but he knew he would hav to work the gospel racket to enable him to touch the sympathies of the priest-ridden public, and do good to those who needed it, and he worked it for that purpose; but to the gospel of superstition was added the gospel of the man himself, the leaven that made his preaching palatable to those who hungered for bread and not stones! The benediction of Howard, who wrote of Kennion, was, "May his soul rest in peace." Knowing nothing of what is meant by soul, as does Howard, I say, "May his body rest in peace," in which case his soul most assuredly will, and his memory be kept green by those whom he benefited more than any parson ever did.

The Injured Boonton God.

Some forty years ago, when I published the Pleasure Boat in Maine, Wm. Coates, of Boonton, N. J., met with a copy of it and subscribed for it, and in a short time I had quite a list of subscribers in that town. When I killed my paper by opposing that iniquitous war against the South, which I hav never repented, I advised them to take the Boston Investigator, the only Liberal paper that I knew at that time.

It appears that the seed sowed by those two and other later papers has taken root, and is about to bear some glorious good fruit and a fine crop. The Liberals there, as you know, invited Mr. Reynolds to come with his tent and giv them some lectures, and the result is that the ignorant bigots hav got him under bonds for blasphemy.

This is the same old spirit that drove the stake, tied John Rogers to it, and lighted the fagots that consumed him; the same spirit that has put millions of the best people to death for not believing in an unseen, unknown, and imaginary God, the myth of ignorant brains; and the time will come when the names of those who hav committed this outrage will stink in the nostrils of all good men, as the names of the old persecutors now do in the nostrils of the most pure and enlightened of our age.

If the Boonton God had power to create this universe out of nothing, by simply saying, "Let it be done!" if he could create a man out of dust, and a full-sized woman out of a small, dry bone; if he could drown a whole world for its wickedness, and rain fire and brimstone from heaven to destroy wicked cities; if he could speak with man's voice through an ass to reprove a venal prophet, and strike a man dead for blasphemy, as they say he does now, it would hav been much wiser to hav left Mr. Reynolds in his care than to hav put forth their own puny, fallible hands to deal with him by human laws which are of no force except when backed up by sword and gun, which their master repudiated. Let this case turn as it may, whether Mr. Reynolds is convicted or not, this action of the bigots will be the death of the Boonton church, and they had better get rid of it the easiest way they can.

Toil on, O ye faithful! and fear not to suffer;
The blood of the martyrs can never be lost;
A world saved from priests will at length be your trophy,
And worth more by millions than all it will cost.

The Great Earthquake.

In all respects the most disastrous earthquake shock ever felt in this country visited Charleston, S. C., and vicinity on the night of Tuesday, August 31st. Half the city was wrecked or burnt; above ninety persons were killed by falling walls, and a hundred were injured. Ten distinct shocks were felt, the first being by far the most violent. Brick buildings fell like cob houses. Great fissures rent the earth, and a strong sulphurous odor pervaded the air. Doubtless many people died without an effort to escape, believing this to be indeed the judgment day. To add fresh terror to the situation, fire broke out, and the wrecked city was illuminated by flames. Everybody came out of doors, and the scenes of confusion and distress were beyond description.

This earthquake, occurring so near home, has aroused new interest in the subject of seismology, and various theories of the cause of these tremendous convulsions are being advanced. The explanation most generally accepted is about as follows: The planet which we inhabit was once a sun, and as such constituted a molten mass of fire. The outside of course cooled first, solidifying and forming a crust after the fashion of the hardened peel of a lemon. We all know that a heated body contracts as it cools. So with the earth; as the heat escapes and the interior mass diminishes in size the outward crust must adapt itself to its shrinking support. In settling, the hardened portion breaks, and portions of it are pushed outward. Thus were thrown up mountain ranges, and thus were caused the unevennesses visible upon the surface of the earth. In times past, when the crust was comparativly thin, these changes must hav been accompanied with tremendous upheavals and contortions, compared with which modern earthquakes are mere local disturbances. At present the process is slow, and is accomplished imperceptibly except where the crust is thinnest. It is undoubtedly continuous, and at some portion or other of the surface of our globe a perpetual tremor might be noted. The reasons for believing that this is the true explanation of earthquake shocks hav been briefly summarized as follows:

1. From very many observations made in mines, artesian wells, etc., it is discovered that there is an increase of temperature from the surface downward, and that this increase is so great that a degree of heat sufficient to melt all known rocks is soon reached.

2. By certain geological agencies certain rocks from below are brought to the surface in mountain building, and these rocks show evidence of having been greatly heated, and even of having been melted.

3. Molten matter in very large quantities comes up from the interior of the earth through crevasses and volcanic veins. Besides these lines of evidence there are many accessory facts which tell the same story.

One of the saddest results of this terrible disaster at Charleston was the exhibition of superstition which it evoked. The reports say that upon all sides could be heard such exclamations as "My God! save us!" "God hav mercy on us sinners!" Men and women could be seen kneeling everywhere, offering up prayers, and the falling walls crushed and killed them as they prayed. To suppose that any of the prayers were answered would be absurd. It is equally absurd to suppose that any prayer depending upon the intervention of some deity ever was answered. God never stood between any person and danger. He did not stand between Garfield and the bullet of the assassin, nor between the Rev. George Haddock and his murderers. He did not stop one brick or stone from falling upon those who knelt to implore his assistance when all other help was out of reach. It is about time these truths were realized. They are taught by every manifestation of nature, and they hav received a fresh illustration from the Charleston holocaust.

The earthquake shocks still continue intermittently, and the inhabitants of the stricken city are living in tents. Appeals for financial aid are being sent out and generously responded to from all over the country. Shocks hav been felt in at least a dozen states besides South Carolina, though nowhere with such severity as in Charleston.

Roman Catholic Encroachment.

The priest in charge of the Roman Catholic parish at Keene, New Hampshire, deserves special recognition from the pope. He has set himself at work to provoke a public school fight in that city, and has succeeded. Some two years ago he endeavored to get himself elected to the school board, but failing after two attempts, he turned his attention to the erection of a parochial school, which was completed last winter, and dedicated by holding in it a fair of a week's duration. For weeks previous to this the priest sent members of his congregation around among the Protestants for signatures and money for chances on different articles to be voted for at the fair. Merchants declining to subscribe were to be boycotted; no Catholic should patronize them. By this method some three thousand dollars was raised direct from Protestants. Thus the parochial school was dedicated and paid for. The total cost was $8,000.

The next concern of the priest was to get material for his Catholic-manufactory. In this circumstances favored him. A large public school-house had been torn down to make way for a new street, and the children were without a school-room. A quarrel was in progress concerning the rebuilding of the institution, and this quarrel, there is reason to believe, the priest has been instrumental in aggravating. During the hottest of the contest the priest throws open the doors of his ample parochial school, and invites parents to send their children. Three hundred pupils are enrolled, which include nearly all the children of school age in the district. The scheme works, and the little flies walk into the parlor of the spider. He then causes a paragraph to be inserted in a local paper asking why there is any reason in going to the expense of building a new public school, since the scholars are already accommodated by the Catholic institution. The editor admits that it would be "money thrown away." Whether the priest has as yet asked for an appropriation from the state school money we are not prepared to say, but that he will do so is beyond a doubt, and that he will get it is about equally certain. The people of the vicinity seem to be too blind or too stupid to realize the drift of events. The local press is dumb and dare not be otherwise. The shadow of the bat is on the roofs of the city.

A Christian Writes Us.

From Spring City, Pa., we get the following by due course of mail:

"SIRS—Enemies of the Cross of Christ: I received from your office a miserable sheet called THE TRUTH SEEKER which I put in the stove you need not send me any more such hash. for

"I hav found the truth in Jesus Christ glory to God. The law came by Moses but grace and truth by Jesus Christ hallelujah bless the Lord.

"He is the first principle of truth.

"Whom you've got to accept or be lost. So you better accept him now. for you are not one step nearer the truth than when you started your Infidel sheet, but you are worse men and you know it.

"there is not a man of good principle among you for none such would connect himself to your foul sheet.

"You men are what is called a lot of learned ignoramuses. I would rather be a slave on New Orleans levy than to be one of your spirit.

"You are not worthy a home in this land.

"O ye generation of vipers

"I do not want to hear anything from you here after unless it is that it is you are soundly converted to God

"In the meantime I will pray ANDREW ORTLIP."

We will cheerfully promis not to send Mr. Ortlip any more papers if he will kindly agree to write us no more letters. We are gradually growing weary of his style of literature, of which we are of late in too frequent receipt. It is a peculiarity of fellows like Ortlip that they cannot conceal their ears, even in writing. It has never occurred to them that decency is among the religious requirements, as perhaps it is not. Some of the vilest, most indecent, and most profane language that could be conveyed on paper has come to us from Christian sources, from writers who professed to be outraged by the contents of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Ortlip himself, though a rather superior specimen, has the courtesy to address his letter to "Skunk Nest, 33 Clinton Place, New York." We would not endeavor to make a Freethinker of this man. Those who ought to know hav assured us that it is impossible to manufacture a silk purse out of a pig's ear, and Mr. Ortlip does not contain the stuff that Freethinkers are made of. That he and the class of which he is a type hav attached themselvs to Christianity is no cause of regret to us, but we hereby extend our sympathy to the Galilean reformer, in whom Mr. Ortlip professes to hav found the truth. Christ had a cross to bear while he lived, but it was a beatitude compared with what has been inflicted upon him in the name of religion since his death.

"In the mean time," concludes Mr. Ortlip, "I will pray." We may add that in the mean time, also, the donkey will bray.

The Unitarians.

The Lutheran Observer of July 30th has a very clear editorial upon the break in the Unitarian ranks, and its conclusions are strictly logical. Unitarianism originally was a protest against orthodoxy, and as such was heresy. For years Unitarians maintained a creedless religion, and were consistent religious reformers. They would adopt no form of creed, simply calling themselvs Christians. As an authoritativ label this was finally objected to and dropped, and they then invited all to fellowship with them

At their last meeting, the name of God was objected to also, on the ground that the word God was dogmatic, and they wanted no dogmatic test to fellowship—that "the proper basis of Unitarianism was ethical, and not in any sense dogmatic or theological." A resolution declaring their purpose "to promote pure Christianity," and another "to promote love to God and love to man," were both voted down, and the only thing they could unite on was a declaration of their purpose "to promote truth, righteousness, and love." In Unity of August 25th the difference between the old and the new is set forth in parallel columns as follows:

1. Is belief in God essential to Unitarianism?
The Christian or Theistic party answer, yes! The Ethical or Unity party in the West answer, no!

2. Is worship essential to Unitarianism?
The Christian or Theistic party answer, yes! The Ethical or Unity party answer, no!

3. Is belief in immortality essential to Unitarianism?
The Christian or Theistic party answer, yes! The Ethical or Unity party answer, no!

4. Ought emphasis to be placed on the spiritual leadership of Jesus Christ, and the historic and vital connection of our movement with the Christian church?
The Christian or Theistic party answer, yes! The Ethical or Unity party answer, not necessarily!

5. Ought our ministry to be open to non-believers in God, immortality, and worship, if such non-believers desire to enter or remain in it?
The Christian or Theistic party answer, no! The Ethical or Unity party answer, yes!

6. Ought our Unitarian name to be regarded as one which may properly be appropriated by Agnostics, Materialists, or Atheists?
The Christian or Theistic party answer, no! The Ethical or Unity party answer, yes!

7. Ought our conferences, associations, and other general organizations which hav administrativ or missionary functions, and ask contributions from our churches to carry on the same, to stand on a distinctly Christian or Theistic basis of declared aim and purpose?
The Christian or Theistic party answer, yes! The Ethical or Unity party answer, no!

8. Ought money contributed to any of our denominational organizations for Unitarian missionary purposes to be used to "giv assistance to any church or organization which does not rest distinctly upon the Christian basis?"
The Christian or Theistic party answer, no! The Ethical or Unity party answer, yes!

9. To sum up in a word, Is Unitarianism essentially or necessarily Christian or Theistic?
The Christian or Theistic party answer, yes! The Ethical or Unity party answer, no!

[10.] On the question of the essentialness of ethics, both are agreed.

[11.] On the essentialness of "Freedom, Fellowship, and Character," both are agreed.

[12.] On the essentialness of "Truth, Righteousness, and Love," both are agreed.

[13.] Both parties unite in saying, Men must believe in all these in order to be true Unitarians; there is no true Unitarianism which leaves these out. So far we go together. Then we separate; and in this wise.

The Christian or Theistic party say, To these Ethical and Freethought essentials must be added certain Christian and Theistic essentials, viz.: At least belief in God, worship, the immortal life, and the moral and spiritual leadership of Jesus. These are precisely as necessary and fundamental in Unitarianism as are Ethics and Freethought. Unitarianism is an arch, one foot of which rests upon Ethics, and the other upon Christian Theism. It is equally impossible to take away either foundation without destroying the arch.

The Ethical or Unity party say, No! Unitarianism is a structure no part of which rests fundamentally on any Christian or Theistic belief whatever, not even belief in God. Ethics and Freethought exhaust its essentials. The Christian and Theistic beliefs named used to be regarded generally as necessary; but that they are so we deny. We contend for a new interpretation of Unitarianism which shall place these among non-essentials. Individually most of us believe, and believe earnestly, in these, and sincerely wish others generally to do the same. But this is purely an individual matter. These Christian and Theistic beliefs are no necessary part of Unitarianism, and need not be declared to be. Nothing is essential to Unitarianism but Ethics and Freethought.

This position of the Unity party has led to a split. Every religious body contains such growing men who, sooner or later, will take a look over the fence around the church. Unitarians had no formulated creed, but they did hav an unwritten one as conservativ and strong with them as the unwritten constitution of England. It was this unwritten creed that drove Putnam and Miln from their ranks, after they had previously outgrown Methodism. But in every religious body also there are men who drag at the coat-tails of the lookers over the fence and beseech them to come back and be contented with the little narrow strip of sky between the church walls and the fence. It is a wonder how this party in the Unitarian ranks ever broke away from orthodoxy. But they hav now united against the majority of the conference that passed the resolution which formulated their "creed" into the ethical purpose of promoting truth, righteousness, and love. Several churches full of this kind of men nav withdrawn from the Unitarian conference and declared their resolve to form a new organization and carry on their work hereafter on a distinctivly Christian basis.

All of this is, as we said, not surprising. So soon as a religious body breaks away from its previous beliefs, the door is opened for unlimited heresy. It is the most natural thing in the world for those who once were satisfied to reject all the dogmas of Christianity but the belief in God, to finally realize that God is also what men make him. Philosophical Agnosticism, expounded by so great a thinker as Herbert Spencer, must inevitably attract many of the best minds in the Unitarian church, and with them a creedal definition of the "Unknowable" is impossible. The past four or five years hav seen Unitarians growing into Agnostics or conservativly defining themselvs as Theists. It is impossible for these to agree upon a creed, and so the growth culminating in the resolution which precipitated the split is only the logical outcome of the first breaking away from orthodoxy. The old-school Unitarians, with their unwritten creed, and their determination to work on a distinctivly Christian basis, will be taken back to the bosom of orthodox Protestantism, and the Agnostics, who work only to promote truth, righteousness, and love, will shortly be classed among the outspoken Infidels. In this separation the Unitarians get little consolation. The orthodox exultingly say that they are reaping, in Agnosticism and unbelief, what they hav been sowing by denouncing creeds and confessions of faith, and the Infidels say that while heretofore Unitarianism has been neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, it will now be possible to classify it among religious sects, and they will rejoice over the accessions to the ranks of the Agnostics. The split, like the Protestant Reformation, was as inevitable as the progress of the race, and the result must certainly count on the side of truth.

PERHAPS the most readable article, as it is sure to be the most read, of any in the September number of the North American Review, is the novelist Ouida's contribution on "Female Suffrage." The fact that such an article has been written by a woman is stronger argument than any reasoning it contains against extending the franchise to her sex. Still, men hav written just as foolishly on the same subject.

The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Mr. Goodell.

It is but a short year ago that THE TRUTH SEEKER felt impelled, in the interests of true piety, to point out that a conspiracy was being concocted to get the Rev. Mr. Downs, of Boston, into deep trouble. It will be recalled that the Rev. Mr. Downs was discovered scantily attired in the private apartment of a parishioner's wife, and that the lady in question was not at the time much better prepared for a cold snap. The explanation given by the Rev. Mr. Downs was perfectly satisfactory to an unprejudiced mind. The lady was to go away the next day, and he had merely been assisting her to pack a trunk. To do this, the weather being warm, he had removed his coat, his waistcoat, and his shoes. No one wearing shoes can pack a trunk as it ought to be packed. The woman's destitute condition as regards clothing was accounted for by the fact that her dress was in the trunk. As we pointed out at the time, there was nothing about all this that a knowledge of the ways of preachers would not lead anyone to expect. In spite of that fact, Parson Downs has been persecuted and despitefully used. Nevertheless, it seems that the Lord was with him, since he has been more popular than ever before, and has brought numerous souls to Christ that might otherwise still be dead in their sins.

We are now called upon to chronicle another case of conspiracy against a truly good man and preacher of the gospel, this time in Rhode Island. It seems that the Methodist Episcopal church at Providence, in that state, is always in hard luck. A few years ago one of the most popular preachers of this denomination was the Rev. Mr. Whitcher, who was the idol of his people. He spread amazing grace around his parish with a gifted and unsparing hand, and was believed by good Methodists to be a special messenger from heaven, ordained to save Providence (R. I.) and its suburbs. But Mr. Whitcher had a fondness for rare books, and the more expensiv they were the more he longed for them. This led him to steal from private and public libraries all the rare and expensiv books he could lay his hands on, with the result that he was apprehended as a thief.

When the Methodists had recovered from the shock of this blow, they cast about for a new pastor, a preference being expressed for a man with less strongly marked literary proclivities than the Rev. Mr. Whitcher possessed. Out of the obscurity of a small town in Massachusetts, the Rev. Charles L. Goodell, the subject of this memoir, finally received the call. He was a young and engaging person physically, and displayed great vivacity and enthusiasm. When something ornamental in the way of a speech was required, Mr. Goodell could be depended upon. Close watch upon his actions satisfied his congregation that Mr. Goodell would not steal books, and they were happy; but the mother-in-law was inconsiderate enough one day to discover her daughter's husband occupying a ministerial attitude toward a good-looking young woman in the back parlor, and a domestic cloud arose. Out of this, however, the pastor emerged triumphantly, and the conference gave him a new charge, with their blessing and a larger salary attached. It is a rule of the Methodist church that no one parish shall hav the monopoly of a good-looking minister for more than two or three years. Variety is the spice of a Methodist parson's existence. But now another blow has fallen, and it is emphasized by affidavits of witnesses connecting the pastor, again in a ministerial capacity, with a certain, or uncertain, Mrs. Foster, whose husband sues for a divorce. Other women are also named. The testimony of Pastor Goodell's wife, it is said, sets forth that it has been several years since he has treated her with "due consideration." All this, of course, is persecution.

Perhaps the most disgusted man connected with the affair is Mr. Foster. He first met Goodell at the Chestnut street church. He admired the pastor very much, and so, unfortunately, did his wife. Foster was one of the richest members of the church, and the superintendent of the Sunday-school. The Fosters, the account says, had a luxurious home, and into the family the Goodells were taken. When Mrs. Foster was at her summer residence in Bristol, and Mr. Foster was absent at his business, the Rev. Goodell, in pursuance of his ministerial duties, also went to Bristol. When, last spring, the conference, in response to the popular demand, again returned Mr. Goodell to the city, this time to the Trinity church, which the Rev. J. Benson, now of Brooklyn, had brought to a high state of efficiency, the whole city, of all denominations, congratulated the Methodists, and Mr. Foster resigned his position in the Chestnut street church, and hired a pew at Trinity, to be with his beloved pastor.

In June last Mr. Foster began to get suspicious of his wife. He pretends that if any one had told him the first of that month that anything was wrong he would hav kicked him out of the house. It did not take him long to learn some surprising facts, and he sent his wife away to Newport. He alleges a belief that either she or the minister needed a vacation. Then he began suit for a separation, and the conspiracy has now taken a legal form.

Of course there will be but one comment upon the conduct of Mr. Foster. His is inconsiderate in the extreme, and can hav but a narrow and restricted conception of the scope of a Methodist parson. A little study of the "Book of Discipline" and the unwritten laws of the Methodist church would hav shown him that the Rev. Mr. Goodell has not exceeded the duties of his high calling, and that his conduct has been in strict accordance with distinguished precedents. The bigotry of the law will perhaps make it hot for Mr. Goodell, but a good deal of fresh evidence will be necessary to convince a discriminating public that he is any more culpable than a great many other reverends who go scot-free.

The State Convention.

From the New York Herald.

SARATOGA, Sept. 4, 1886.—There was an increased attendance at the New York State Freethinkers' Convention at Saratoga Lake to-day. At the afternoon session Mr. L. K. Washburn spoke on "The Coming Religious Conflict." He freely criticised Christianity as a theological system, humorously touching the Thirty-nine Articles and severely denouncing the church for assuming the guardianship of public and private morals. He denounced the Christian editors and writers who hav recently characterized Freethinkers as Anarchists.

In the evening ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds delivered a lecture entitled, "Sabbath or Sunday," in which he made a vigorous argument against Sunday being observed as the Sabbath Secularists are in favor of Sunday keeping, not as a day for religious worship, but as a day of rest and recreation. Giv to all the privilege of spending its hours as they elect without encroaching upon the rights of others. He claimed that according to the Bible itself the seventh day, or Saturday, was the rest day whose observance was enjoined. He also maintained that Christ did not change the rest day from Saturday to Sunday. He concluded by saying that there was no authority in heaven nor earth for the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath, save that of the pope and the decrees of the Roman Catholic church. He declared, therefore, that Catholics alone are consistent in observing Sunday, since they believe their holy Roman church is infallible and cannot err, and she boasts of having made this change of the Sabbath from Saturday to Sunday.

To-morrow a large crowd is expected. J. J. McCabe will lecture in the morning, L. K. Washburn in the afternoon, and and Mrs. F. C. Reynolds in the evening. The last named speaker will discuss the subject, "Woman—Past, Present and Future."

THE CROWD ARRIVES.

SARATOGA, N. Y. Sept. 5, 1886.—The Freethinkers' Convention at the White Sulphur Springs Hotel had a very large attendance to-day. The pavilion was crowded and there were hundreds of people around the hotel and park unable to gain admittance. The first speaker was Mr. J. J. McCabe, of Albany, whose subject was "Science and Theology." The speaker said science was the knowledge of things grounded on demonstration. "What is theology." The clergy say it is the science of God. "What is God?" Technically it is the worship of everything, from a fly to the whole univere; practically it is anything we make a god of. He then traced man from his first barbarous notions of a deity up to his latest conceptions on the subject. He attempted to show that in proportion to his increase in knowledge his conceptions changed for the better. Then, passing to an examination of the Old Testament, he attempted to show the absurdities in which it abounded. One of the best arguments against the divinity of Jesus, he said, is furnished in the apparent approval which the gospels make him giv to the most absurd stories in the Jewish Bible—such as the stories of Adam, Jonah, the Israelites living on manna in the desert, etc.

In the afternoon a very large audience greeted Mr. L. K. Washburn, of Boston, who spoke on "The False Teachings of the Christian Church."

The evening session was devoted to a lecture by Mrs. F. C. Reynolds upon "Woman—Past, Present and Future." Mrs. Reynolds made the most decided hit in the Convention so far. She took strong ground in favor of giving a wider scope to the work and consequent influence of women in the world, tracing the growth of liberal ideas on this point from the dawn of civilization. Woman occupies, she said, a vastly higher plane of power now than ever before, and this is but the beginning, which shows simply the outlines and suggestions of the grandeur of the work before her in the future. Mrs. Reynolds was frequently and vigorously applauded.

Letters from Friends.

TOUTI, ILL., Aug. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: There seems to be a diversity of opinion in regard to the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER. My wife and I heartily approve of them; they are the first thing looked at, and we hav much pleasure in showing them.

The clergy stand in mortal fear of ridicule. They hav held place because people hav been educated to think their trade too sacred to be viewed with a critical eye or be made light of in any way.

Hoping that Watson Heston is a young man and a descendant in a direct line of Methuselah, I remain, A. HOPE.

SILEX, ARK., Aug. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I learn from THE TRUTH SEEKER of 7th inst. that Brother Reynolds has been visited by a religious cyclone, which destroyed the roof of his house. In our rural district, when one of our neighbors suffers loss by fire or storm, we make what we call a bee. All turn out and make his domicil good as new, and sometimes better. Now, I think the Liberals should turn out and put a new roof on Brother Reynolds's house. Inclosed find my shingle for that purpose, with instructions for Brother Reynolds to nail it on where it will do the most good. H. L. BAILEY.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Aug, 23, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.25, to be applied as follows: $3 to pay my subscription; $1 to the illustration fund, as I think the pictures of Watson Heston make THE TRUTH SEEKER the grandest paper in the world; $1 please hand to Mr. C. B. Reynolds, to help fight the enemies of Freethought—and I must say here, Bravo for Robert G. Ingersoll, the worthy president of the American Secular Union, for rendering assistance to Mr. Reynolds in defending him. For the other 25 cents please send me a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC for 1886. I shall never do without THE TRUTH SEEKER.

With success to yourself and your grand paper, I remain,
A brother in Freethought, G. H. SOHEEL.

NEWPORT, MAINE, Aug. 24, 1886.

TO THE READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I am this day, Aug. 24th, seventy-three years old. I feel it to be proper to make this request. For at least sixty-five years I hav been a producer—a farmer and mechanic. Twelve years ago my home, a home made with my own hands of twenty-five years of hard labor, by mortgage passed from my hands. Since then I hav had no home of my own. I hav traveled a great deal, and hav sold and given away a great deal of the best reading, and hav done a good deal of work on a farm, for which I hav received nothing. I hav just had another edition of my paper, the World's Reformer, printed, and I kindly ask those who are able to send me a dollar, or less if they cannot afford that sum, and I will send them their money's worth in what I feel to be a paper worth circulating.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

GENESSEE, Aug. 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I find I am in arrears again with my subscription. If you will pardon me, I will try and do better in the future. Wife and I could not get along without the noble TRUTH SEEKER. It just suits us. The "Letters from Friends" comes every week to cheer us up, and is one of the best parts of it. The "Gems of Thought" can't be beat. And, last but not least, the illustrations are just splendid. I care not how hard they hit or how much they hurt. They, the orthodox, hit us as hard blows as they know how, and speak, and, perhaps, think, as meanly of us as they can. The true way is to pay them back in the same kind of coin, so if they are not too stupid to learn it will teach them that as they giv they must expect to receive. Go right along with the illustrations, and let every Liberal feel under obligation to get a new subscriber for everyone who cries, "Stop my paper." L. G. BARNES.

NEW YORK, Aug. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Will you permit me to say a few words to J. W. Benoit, of Oakland, Ill., to whose query you editorially replied in your issue of August 28th?

When a Christian asks, "Can you giv me a better god?" does this not show the mercenary light in which he regards his God? He serves his God and worships him. Why? Because in the long run he expects it to pay. He is supposed to deny himself worldly pleasures, and thus secure stock in the New Jerusalem. He thinks he is making a splendid bargain—a shrewd stroke of business—in swapping a few years here for a great many more years hereafter. If the Bible is true, a person is a fool who acts otherwise. But the question between Christianity and Freethought is not one of giving or taking away. It is simply one of truth and delusion.

Suppose I make the acquaintance of a young man who was raised by his parents and taught from his babyhood that by investing every cent he could make in lottery tickets he would, by his fortieth birthday, win a $100,000 prize. He devotes all his time and energy to making money, with which he buys tickets. I say to him, "My friend, your parents were mistaken. If you should liv two centuries you would never win so much money." Then he would reply, "If you take away my $100,000, for which I hav labored so long, what will you giv me instead?" I can giv him nothing. There is no question of giving. This prize exists only in imagination, and his efforts are misdirected.

This life is the only one we will liv, and instead of "feeding on wind and pursuing after the east wind," as Ephraim is reported to hav done, it would be far better to take the $800,000,000 invested in churches and other "next-world" property, and apply it to the building of schools, hospitals, and asylums. And the thousands of able-bodied persons who are wasting their time and energy in upholding a delusion could be better employed in adding to the earthly comfort or alleviating the misery of their fellow-men.

SAM C. MCELWEE.

EAST OAKLAND, CAL., Aug. 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I wish I could put on paper in a readable manner the tremendous feelings of my heart when I read about the actions of what was once my church, the Catholic. I can hardly realize the fact, although I know it to be true, that men like bishops and priests, men of learning, should be so depraved as to teach our children such most damnable lies. For thirty years I believed in the Virgin story, and heaven, hell, and purgatory, in their money-making saving business. According to your pictures, which I admire, those bishops and priests all go to hell; and, being an Infidel, I must go, too. Well, I'll make it hot for them, for if there is a class of men on our planet that I detest it is those rogues that fight our schools so they can get our children to make fools and slaves of them. Of all the ingenuity practiced by religionists the Catholic is the most complete for making fools of our children. Oh, my friend, there is too much truth for our dear children to learn! American children can not afford to waste their valuable time in trying to learn what they never can know. THOMAS ARPER.

CARTHAGE, MO., Aug. 17, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Find $1 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the balance of the year.

Well, Mr. Macdonald, I read with astonishment in your paper of August 7th of the arrest of Mr. Reynolds. Is it possible, in this much-boasted-of free and civilized country, to hear of such religious fanaticism? Oh, we hav a tremendous work before us! I do all in my power that I can. I hav saved the souls of my family, and made a few doubters around me, but can get no subscribers for your paper. Times are too hard for people to get money. The trouble is, the most of us are poor, and hav not the influence we should hav, and the rich, with a few exceptions, will not do anything, and money is needed to send lecturers all over the country. Now, if every reader of your paper would pay ten cents a month (the poorest of us could do that), we could send a few more good speakers to preach the new gospel of salvation; and they that will not listen, let them go wherever they hav a mind to.

With the hope that Mr. Reynolds may get safe out of the clutches of the Jersey bigots, with the best wishes to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its readers, I remain

Yours, CHAS. SAGNER.

BOERNE, TEX., Aug. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to announce to you the death of Wm. Hillert, of New Braunfels, Texas, a Freethinker and friend of humanity. He was an old subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and, if I am not mistaken, an occasional contributor. Hillert was born near Berlin, Germany, about sixty years ago. After graduating at the Gymnasium at Berlin at the age of seventeen, he entered the service of the government as civil engineer and draughtsman. A Freethinker from the start, of which he made no secret, he soon came in conflict with the clergy. He also was an open republican. This at last made his stay in the old country uncongenial and caused him to emigrate to Texas in 1847. He settled in the mountains near New Braunfels, then yet a very wild country inhabited by the Comanche Indians, and commenced farming. In spite of the privations of a frontier life, he kept in correspondence with the outside world. When the Abolition movement began he advocated the abolition of slavery with pen and word—certainly a daring undertaking in a slave country. During the civil war he was a stanch Union man.

He, perhaps more than any other one man, prevented the churches from getting a foothold in the mountains of Texas, an area of sixteen hundred square miles. He leaves a good wife and eight well-brained children, besides a host of friends.

In his private dealings he was a man of scrupulous honesty. He would never contract a debt. No one ever held his note. He would even rather forego the necessities of life than go in debt. He always paid as he went. F. W. SOHWEPPE.

GREELEY, COL., Aug. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The people of Greeley hav been somewhat aroused by Mr. S. P. Putnam, who has delivered four lectures here. "If there is anybody more enthusiastic and better calculated to impart something of his enthusiasm to others than Mr. Putnam, I do not know him." After hearing him speak, all his writings are more interesting than ever. My father, Dr. Camp, takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I liv with him and hav the privilege of reading it; so, instead of going to church or reading the Bible, I find something a great deal better in THE TRUTH SEEKER and books which I bought of Mr. Putnam. Mr. Putnam lectured here on the 17th and 18th of August. The first night he lectured, the Unitarians had a lawn sociable to keep any of their flock from attending, for they are going to build a new church and want the support of the Liberals, who go with them for the want of a better place, and are a little afraid of public opinion. We used their hall, and at seven o'clock they sent an expressman and took away fifty of the chairs; but we got more and listened to "The Glory of Infidelity," and it rained so hard they could not hav the lawn party. The second night Mr. Putnam organized a Secular Union. It is a small one, but we will all work, and I hope it will grow and be a benefit to this part of the world, for they need something besides churches. We hav a great deal to do and few to help do it, but I hope we will be able to establish a flourishing Union. I will try and send you some new subscribers soon for your valuable paper. My life would not be much without it; it is to me what the Bible is to the Christian. I hope Mr. Putnam will come again some time.

EULAH C. STILLWELL.

DENVER, COL., Aug. 22, 286.

MR. EDITOR: August 8th and 15th we had Mr. Putnam here to lecture. Both nights he gave us the very best gems of Liberal thought. His audiences were large, and, judging from the repeated applause, appreciativ. On August 8th about twelve hundred people listened to his discourse on "Mental Liberty;" many more to his second effort, "The New Heaven and Earth."

We expected a feast of good things when Mr. Putnam came. We received all and more than we hoped for. He is a graceful, earnest, and enthusiastic speaker—the needed man in the right place.

On the evening of the 17th Mr. Putnam met with us and formed a Secular Union, thirty-eight joining. Enthusiasm prevailed. All the expenses of the lectures were promptly met and $33 raised for Mr. Putnam.

When we get our charter and hav things in working order, we shall hav a large League in Denver.

Thousands of dollars hav been taken out of this city during the last two years by itinerant revivalists. I cannot understand it. We hav, I am informed, over forty churches; each church has its pastor. These men are generally well paid. They claim to hav a "call" to save souls, but somehow the "holy spirit" will not work with them in the conversion of sinners; so when new recruits are wanted for the churches a revivalist, who is more "hail fellow, well met" with the converting agency, has to be summoned to the "help of the Lord against the mighty." Strange, is it not?

The churches are improving, however. One revivalist preached a literal fire and brimstone hell; polite Christian ears were greatly shocked. One orthodox minister said more harm had been done by such a sermon than all the pastors in Denver could undo in three months. Glory to common sense! Yet this man preached the unadulterated Bible hell. What can they do about it?

There was more sense, truth, and eloquence in Mr. Putnam's two lectures than in all the orthodox sermons preached here in a year. I trust the time is not far distant when he can return and stay longer with us.

MRS. BUCKNER-JOHNSON, M.D.

BARRE, MASS., Aug. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Having received a letter from a correspondent in Young county, Texas, containing so many excellent things, with his permission I send a few extracts to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication.

The writer is a strong, robust young man, twenty-six years of age, formerly a successful school-teacher, now a civil engineer and land surveyor. It will be seen, first, that he is from all Liberal society; second, though unmated, he has the true bravery of manhood to remain so rather than unite with a Christian (for which he should be commended); and, third, he can not perceive how strong, clear, intellectual powers can be so obscured by the myths of old theology as to blind their possessor to the fatal delusion of Christianity! How many men like him are struggling on alone for lack of a companion or a congenial one because Christianity claims most of our young girls, women, and wives is unknown. Oh! that woman would rise and shake off the slavish thraldom of the yoke of superstition, and with man—her husband—seek to crush out the most infamous religion that ever cursed the earth!

THE LETTER.

. . . It has been so long since I hav seen or talked to a genuin Liberal that, with the poet Moore, I sometimes

Feel like one who treads alone
Some banquet hall deserted.

This country is priest-ridden, and every institution is headed by the church. I cannot enjoy anything that savors of the old dogmas that I know to be so detrimental to liberty, and as it would be a very difficult matter to find anything in this country wholly free from superstitious ideas of some kind, I feel very isolated sometimes. And, again, I must either hold my tongue and tolerate the silly arguments that I so despise, or openly declare my honest convictions and be socially ostracized and shunned as though I were a leper. Of the two evils, I choose the former, whether it is the best or not, and it is policy; but I hope to see the time when a man is valued for his true worth, and not for what he believes or professes to believe; when a man can speak his mind and not lower himself in the social scale; when a man shall be measured by worth and not by faith. Such a time, I believe, will come, and I hope to liv to see it. I am so much alone in my views, and am troubled so much in consequence, that I sometimes think of coming North to find some kindred spirits with whom I can enjoy myself. The world has gone well with me since I last wrote you, and I am still in robust health. . . . I hav not seen fit to change my condition in life. Need I say that too much religion among the gentle sex is the principal cause? It is even so. I had far rather lead the life of a bachelor than to be married to a woman who is identified with any of the religious sects of to-day. Don't think me illiberal (if I may use the word) in this view. I show my willingness to grant them their dogmas by letting them alone, but I am sure they would not be as charitable to me. [Indeed they would not; you are just right, my boy.]

I am often puzzled to think that belief in such absurdities as the story of the creation, the flood, resurrection, etc., can be associated in the same mind with such sound ideas as I hav heard some professed Christians express. My father, for instance, is by occupation a civil engineer and land surveyor, and possesses a thorough knowledge of mathematics, together with ancient history, etc., and still he is a devout

Christian. Did such ideas as the above ever occur to your mind?

Yes, my friend, over and over and again, and I account for it in this way—early teaching, popular opinion, and the love of society—just the excuse you make for holding your peace, policy—induce thousands to join the church who no more believe in the creed than do you; others cannot bear ridicule and so go with the crowd, while poor woman, from a variety of causes, cannot let go of her "dear Jesus." But I must not go on expatiating on woman or any of the points touched in this letter, but invite the attention of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the same.

MR. EDITOR: My friend Professor Bell calls me to account for my Prohibition. After much deliberation and a suspension of judgment for a period of over five years, I hav come to the conclusion that Prohibition is right, and perfectly consistent with Liberalism. Furthermore, the success and good effects of the system speak volumes in its favor. The fact that church people often make themselvs conspicuous in the matter has prejudiced many good Liberals against it. The only rational way is to try the question on its meriis, and not allow side issues to prejudice our opinions. We will find good and bad people on both sides of this question.

The open, promiscuous selling of intoxicating liquors should be prohibited by law; we hav as much right to regulate the sale of alcohol as that of any other poison. And such regulation is no hardship or injustice to anyone. In this way we lessen poverty, crime, and human suffering, reduce the burden of taxation, and abolish three-fourths of the criminal courts, prisons, and almshouses. An open saloon is a blight upon any community. It is a manufactory and rendezvous of criminals; and the maintenance of such an institution is a crime against the public. I am not in favor of licensing crime, but am in favor of closing these places wherever it can be done.

Prohibition does not dictate to a man what he shall or shall not drink. All this talk about it interfering with personal liberty or being legislation against the shape of a man's head I regard as pure sophistry, although well calculated to mislead. Under Prohibition, if a man thinks he needs liquor, he can get it, but he must buy it as a medicin; the result is that the use of it is reduced to a minimum.

Prohibition is progressiv, radical, and right, and Freethinkers can well afford to favor it. A. T. MCMILLAN.

BERLIN, N. J., Aug. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: There is one thing I feel perfectly satisfied of, beyond all doubt, and that is that if there is a supreme being worthy to be called God, he has kept himself out of the sight of men, and is not the monstrous, partial, unjust, cruel, angry, revengeful, murderous, abhorrent being that the Old Testament calls God.

I hav been carefully reading the first five books of the Old Testament, and such another mess of partiality, injustice, revenge, and cruelty I never found in any other book. I could sooner believe that "Gulliver's Travels" is all true than believe that a god could be guilty of all the monstrous falsehoods, absurdities, and outrages that are imputed to God in that book.

It says God made man, but made such a mistake and failure in the work that he repented of having made him, and got up a flood and drowned all but eight, whom he was foolish enough to save to perpetuate the same worthless breed—drowned them, when he had the power to change their hearts or dispositions in a moment of time, and make them just what he would hav them to be. Why did he not do it, and make them all good, pure, and happy? Or why did he not drown the whole lot, and hunt up some better dust, and start a new and better race, and save a nation like this the expense of supporting eighty thousand priests and building millions of dollars' worth of churches to patch up his blunders, and try in vain to make a decent race out of such bad materials?

Just read those old books—the first five in the Bible—and see what a fickle, wrathful being the God of that book is. He sent out Moses with an army to kill all the tribe of Benjamin, and not let a single soul escape. They killed all but six hundred cowardly men who forsook their mothers, wives, and children, and got among the rocks, where the army could not get at them, proving that they were commanded, if they were commanded at all, to do what they found impossible.

Then, when they got together to worship, they began to whine about the tribe of Benjamin, whom God had commanded them to exterminate: "Our poor brother Benjamin. What shall we do for Benjamin?" So they got up a plan, by order of the same God, to save the tribe he had commanded them to destroy. They were commanded to go out against another tribe and slay all the men, all the married women and the children, and save the virgins as wives for the six hundred human devils that God had tried to kill but could not!

Now, what kind of a marriage was that for a God to institute? How much love or respect could those virgins hav for men for whom their parents and little brothers and sisters had been butchered before their eyes? I never swore but one oath in my life, and that one was not spoken aloud, but I will now venture to say, To sheol with such a marriage as that, whether it is instituted by God, man, or the devil!

Well, they got four hundred virgins and gave them as wives to those cowardly men, not one of whom was worthy of a wife.

Still there were more than two hundred men not supplied. What next? "Go ye up to Shilo [like thieves or robbers] and lie in wait in the vinyards," and when the innocent daughters, weary of toil, come forth to hav a little healthy recreation in the dance, let each man leap forth and catch a miss. Another horrible marriage! How many men are there now among two hundred that would be willing to rush into a company of strange girls and grab the first one he could get hold of for a life-companion? And how many girls in two hundred, as anxious as too many of them are to be married, would be willing to be caught by a strange man, of whose character, disposition, and habits she was ignorant, and made a wife of by force? I could write a book as large as the Bible about the absolute falsehoods, mistakes, errors, partialities, contradictions, impossibilities, absurdities, murders, injustice, vulgarities, and other abominations blasphemously charged to a pure, just, and merciful God in that old book by ignorant men in barbarous ages, and which hav been crammed into the minds of ignorant, unthinking people for fifteen hundred years by ignorant or designing priests, too lazy to work and too proud to beg in an honest way. But this, I hope, will be sufficient to set the reader to reading the old book and thinking for himself. When the Bible is placed on a level with the other works of men, it will be comparativly harmless; but so long as it is called the word of a God, it will continue, as in the past, to do more harm than any other book ever published, for within its pages authority may be found for the commission of every species of vice and crime. JER. HAOKER.

AUSTIN, Mo., Aug. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money-order for $3.35 for another year in company with the readers and contributors of the TRUTH SEEKER family, and for the balance send me "Anti-Prohibition," Bell; and "Liberty and Morality," Bell.

Your renewal reminder is received, but it was wholly unnecessary, for I hav become so attached to the great religious truths promulgated through your columns that it is almost as impossible for me to liv without the paper as it is for life to be sustained without oxygen.

I had not really begun to liv until I became acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER some five years ago, since which time I hav been a constant reader and expect to be to the end. I hav only to regret that I did not know of the existence of the paper in my younger days—days and years that were wasted; yes, more than wasted, for then I was insulting God to his face (if there be a God) by attributing to him the authorship of that old Jew book. I believed (in fact, I had to believe, if I believed the Bible) that God was a tyrant, a villain, a monster, a demon; that he was a liar, a thief, a murderer, and that he never missed an opportunity of wreaking his vengeance, destruction, and death, and in many instances without a shadow of a cause.

I was taught, admonished, and exhorted to believe in the goodness, the mercy, the graciousness, the justice, of that great, infinit God, and that I ought to be perfectly willing to praise and glorify his name, if he, in his infinit wisdom, thought it would add to his glory to send me to hell. And I was taught that if I doubted the justice and mercy of God I was doomed eternally to a literal hell—a lake of fire and brimstone—and the devil and his imps would stand guard with long-handled forks and keep me eternally pushed out into the very depths of hell.

But since I hav been doing a little thinking for myself I hav come to different conclusions. I do not believe in a personal, individual God or devil, a literal hell or future punishment; and if there is anything inherent in the laws of nature that will continue our existence in the future under other conditions, we do not know it and cannot know it. And should there be a future life, the conditions may be such that we will hav no more knowledge of the life we hav lived in this world than we now hav of time before our existence here. How foolish it is for the clergy to pretend to teach something they do not and cannot know anything about!

I do not see how any true Liberal, anyone who is opposed to the tyranny of the church, can object to the cartoons. I earnestly indorse them. I think it is a great feature added to the paper; they are read at a glance by the people of all languages; they contain condensed history, history multum in parvo. It would require many pages of written matter to tell what the cartoons tell at a glance. But some few do object to them, for fear it might hurt the feelings of some of their church friends. THE TRUTH SEEKER is not run in the interest of the church. Let the cartoons appear weekly on the first and last pages and it will please ninety-nine-hundredths of TRUTH SEEKER readers.

Success to Watson Heston. R. A. SMILEY.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Aug. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: "He goes—I know not where, but he does." This was the remark of a lady friend yesterday morning, at the same time asking me with her to watch the course of a large ant carrying an object of nearly his size. Leaving her to enjoy this pleasure, I engaged on a more practical part of our garden. Soon seeing her outside, I hastily inferred that, failing in the ant adventure, she had found something else of more interest. But in due time she returned, soliciting my attention for a few minutes, when she led me some thirty yards through the gate to the wonderfully busy home of a large family of ants. precisely matching in size the one she had followed, depositing in his home his precious burden. On his long way she noticed that he ran an air-line, deviating only to pass obstructions. In the evening I chanced to find in our garden another family of the same class whence our messenger came. In all probability they had all lived together until it became wise to divide, to avoid the jam from an increasing dense family. Leaving some of their goods—possibly children or invalids—behind, this faithful worker had engaged in transporting as a common carrier. We now regret that we had not arrested him, detached his burden, and, with our microscope, learned just what it was. But enough was taught us in this Sunday's incident to justify the industry, economy, and wisdom of the ants. This is the general and well-deserved compliment given them.

Though their home in our garden may slightly interfere with contiguous vegetables, it shall not be disturbed, as I shall not soon forget the abuse a like family suffered from a barbarous young man two years since. Directing his attention to their industrious skill and system, he jumped upon their place and stamped all he could into the earth, then trying to turn aside the sting of my reproofs by saying they ate plants, etc. His parents, brothers, and sisters were of the established English church, and, of course, believed that, as their holy Bible taught, the Lord had created all things good and preserved them in the ark. Being the perfect creatures of a perfect God, it was the consistent duty of his regenerated and sanctified son to murder down ruthlessly these wiser and more harmless little creatures. If such be the fruits, what must be the tree? The reasoning from effect to cause no less than from cause to effect proves the Bible to be a barbarous book. A posteriori and a priori combine to demonstrate this lamentable and, must it be added, horrible fact.

The grand modern science of evolution, binding, as it does, the entire animal kingdom into one vast generic family, is doing much, probably more than any other branch of learning, to unshackle and civilize the minds of our kind. While it unites all Freethinking scientists in a common belief, and goes far in discovering the origin of our race, it instructs and converts more than a few preachers of a bad, superstitious book. Beecher and Dr. Woodrow are but specimens of this widening, happy influence. Like the woman's leaven in the meal, this pure truth and incontrovertible science is leavening the whole lump.

Besides, it is seen doing a humane work for oppressed animals even beyond the noble efforts of Bergh. His lectures and his law are good specifics, while Freethought, truth-loving editors and lectures, are yet mightier in their generic blows. Putting the ax to all evil roots, slaying absurdities and superstitions, the ground is cleared and the way opened for abundant crops of delicious fruits. Get the weeds, thorns, and thistles out of the ground, that useful products may grow. One must see and abhor the false and the evil ere he can cleave to the good.

With no faith or manner of old-fashioned piety, Burns, from his tender, noble, manly heart, could pour out these immortal words about his distressed mousie:

I'm truly sorry man's dominion
Has broken nature's social union,
And justifies that ill opinion
Which makes thee startle
At me, thy poor earth-born companion
And fellow-mortal.

In this there is more honor and social science than in all the sermons ever delivered, or all the books ever written to bolster up an inhuman, superstitious, bloody book.

CHARLOTTE TOWN, PRINCE EDWARD'S ISLAND, Aug. 23, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5—$1 to assist poor Reynolds in his fight with the Christian mob of Methodists and Catholics, $1 to help pay expenses of Convention at Saratoga, and $3 to extend subscription on paper, charging me $4 on THE TRUTH SEEKER from the commencement of the cartoons. I would my purse was sufficiently plethoric to send $50 instead of $5 to assist the various laudable objects the Union, under such formidable difficulties, is striving to accomplish. Considering the power and prestige of your enemies, I often wonder at your pluck and persistence in continuing the conflict. Surely every true Liberal cannot eschew the responsibility of holding up your hands with not only his sympathy and coöperation, but also with funds according to his ability. The present position of Charlotte Town is unfortunate, burdened as it is with the maintenance of one holy Catholic church; and, although times are very hard and the dupes generally poor, still the clergy hav ordered the erection of another to cost some $150,000. In addition, they hav to maintain two costly Methodist churches, two costly Presbyterian, two very costly Baptist, one ditto Puseyite, one ditto Episcopal, and, in addition, the evangelist, Mitchell, with his spacious tent where hundreds congregate Sunday and week-day, day and night; also the Gospel and Salvation Armies with their drums, etc., making day and night hideous. This, for a population of about ten thousand, one would suppose must strain their financial powers pretty severely. No doubt there are a considerable number of Liberals of the various grades in the city, but, as in other places, few of them hav the courage to face the storm that bigotry and prejudice would bring upon them. I am not aware that THE TRUTH SEEKER, or any other Liberal paper, comes to our post-office except my own. But as I hav been notorious as a quasi Liberal, or Universalist, for over thirty years, the prejudice against me has partially subsided. The fact is they dare not attack my moral character, although some thirty years ago certain Methodist ministers used their best exertions to hav me driven out of the place where I then resided. Now, Mr. Editor, you can conceive that after all the experience I hav had for near seventy-five years, what an intellectual treat it would afford me to be near and able to attend at the coming Convention at Saratoga, and listen to the advocacy of the truth from such able men and women as will be on hand, and which I hav never had the privilege of hearing advocated from a public platform. I do not doubt you will sympathize with me in my isolated position.

But as I hav now exceeded my allotted time, and cannot expect to realize what I confidently anticipate will be the satisfying experience of younger men, it is still a great solace to me, in my isolated position, to perceive that the day-star is rising on high, and science comes on with her conquering legions, and every respectable, time-honored lie must shortly fly from her face to the mythical regions. And viewing the near approach of this joyful time in a much clearer and intelligent perspectiv than I can hav the means of doing, is for the Union a strong means of encouragement to persevere with an otherwise discouraging prospect. Wishing you all a glorious time and great results at the coming Convention, I am, as ever,

Yours in bonds of sympathy, JAS. B. GRAY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

My Choice.

Yes, I know there are stains on my carpet—
The traces of small, muddy boots,
And I see your fair tapestry glowing
All spotless, with blossoms and fruits!

And I know that my walls are disfigured
With prints of small fingers and hands,
And I see that your own household whiteness
All fresh in its purity stands!

Yes, I know my "black walnut" is battered,
And dented by many small heels,
While your own polished stairway all perfect
Its smooth, shining surface reveals.

And I know that my parlor is littered
With many odd treasures and toys,
While your own is in daintiest order,
Unharmed by the presence of boys!

And I know that my room is invaded
Quite boldly all hours of the day,
While you sit in your own unmolested,
And dream the soft quiet away.

Yes, I know that I hav jackets that wear out,
And buttons that never will stay,
While you can embroider at leisure,
And learn pretty arts of crochet.

And I know there are lessons of spelling
Which I must be patient to hear,
While you may sit down to your novel,
Or turn the last magazine near!

Yes, I know there are four little bedsides
Where I must stand watchful each night,
While you may go out in your carriage,
And flash in your dresses so bright!

Now, I think I'm a neat little woman—
I like my house orderly, too,
And I'm fond of all dainty belongings—
Yet I would not change places with you!

No! keep your fair home with its order,
Its freedom from trouble and noise,
And keep your own fanciful leisure,
But giv me my four splendid boys!

—Jerome Harrison.

Spring-time; or, the Little Poet.

Flossie Stanhope was orphaned at an early age, and, as she had no relativs that the townspeople knew of, she was taken to the poorhouse. Mr. and Mrs. Williams, who lived there to manage the farm and care for the paupers, were not very kind to this little waif, who was sensitiv in the highest degree, and needed kind and affectionate care and treatment. Any child in a like situation would suffer, but her extremely sensitiv and delicate organism made her suffering more intense. Her beautiful amber curls were cropped short by Mrs. Williams on her arrival at the poorhouse. Her lovely curls that her dear mother had so delighted to twine around her fingers, and arrange in perfect order for her father to admire and praise! Click, click, went the shining, cruel scissors, while sobs that she could not suppress came from her throat as the golden mass accumulated on the floor at her side.

"What are you sniveling about?" asked Mrs. Williams. "Because I'm cutting off this mess of snarls?"

"Mamma used to comb and curl my hair every day, and then it was not snarled, and papa used to call me his little golden head."

"You needn't think you'll get any such nonsense talked to you here, nor that I'm going to comb and fix up such a mess of hair as that every day either."

There were a few other children there besides Flossie, but they were too rough for her to associate or play with. When obliged to come in contact with them they were very unkind, and tortured her in various ways. At length they were all sent to the village school. Unless Flossie could manage to go and come from school by herself these children annoyed her on the one-mile walk all the way, sometimes by bad and rough talk, and often by throwing stones at her, and even hitting her with them, or by striking her if no one was passing by on the road. If the roads were muddy they compelled her to walk in the mud and water, and, pushing her down, thus caused her to be whipped by Mrs. Williams for "being so careless, and getting her clothes so dirty that they never could be got clean again;" and Flossie dared not tell the truth, for the children had threatened dire vengeance if she "telled on us."

Gertie Lawrence, the school-teacher, had a home in the city. Her parents were wealthy, and she was not obliged to teach, but she came to this village to visit an old and dearly loved schoolmate, Minnie Jason. Mr. Jason, her father, was superintendent of the school, and was disappointed in his failure to hire the teacher he expected. As Minnie was as yet unqualified for a teacher, and Gertie had even a teacher's diploma, Minnie suggested that she should teach the summer term. "I will do it," she replied, "so I will hav had some experience should I ever be obliged to teach. I will teach and giv the money I earn to some one who is poor."

"That is what you always think of—helping some poor and unfortunate person. I wish everyone was as good as you are, dear Gertie," said Minnie.

"There are many much better than I am, darling."

"Then I would like to form their acquaintance."

Here some one called and conversation ceased.

Flossie's age was now about ten years, but she was so very small that she looked much younger.

Gertie, not knowing her history, had paid her no particular attention, except to greet her kindly and hear her lessons, which she always recited perfectly. She had, however, noticed that the child possessed uncommon beauty, and that her noon lunch was very meager, and sometimes unwholesome, and often gave her a piece of pie or cake from her own basket.

Nearly all the children had of late formed the habit of drawing rude pictures on their slates during study hours, and as it greatly interfered with their lessons, Gertie had made several efforts to stop them. One day she discovered Flossie to be very busy with slate and pencil and walked quietly over to her side, but instead of the picture she expected to see, she saw and read the following:

No one has loved me since my papa
And dear mamma were gone,
And many are the tears I've shed;
Many the sighs I've drawn.
A kick or a blow
From Susan or Joe,
Or an unkind word
Is all I hav heard
From nearly all,
Both great and small.
I sigh to die,
And pray to-day,
To see near me
Grim death. My breath,
Oh, cease! Release,
O Ghole, my soul!

"Where did you find or learn those lines, Flossie?" asked Gertie.

Flossie started on discovering her teacher by her side.

"I—I made it up," she replied in a frightened voice. "I hav not made any pictures, and I hav learned my lesson."

"Did you compose that all yourself, Flossie?"

"Yes."

"Stay in to-night after the others hav left; I wish to talk with you a little. Do not rub out the lines."

"Did I do wrong to write them?"

"No."

At the usual hour the children were dismissed. Flossie alone remaining.

"Are your papa and mamma dead, Flossie?" asked Gertie.

"Yes."

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

Touch it Never.

Children, do you see the wine
In the crystal goblet shine?
Be not tempted by its charm;
It will surely lead to harm.
Children, hate it!
Touch it never!
Fight it ever!
Do you know what causeth woe
Bitter as the heart can know?
'Tis that self-same ruby wine
Which would tempt that soul of thine.
Children, hate it!
Touch it never!
Fight it ever!
Never let it pass your lips;
Never even let the tips
Of your fingers touch the bowl;
Hate it from your inmost soul.
Truly hate it!
Touch it never!
Fight it ever!

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—A CHARADE.

The first's a kind of fairy;
The second's a cap that's hairy;
If Elisha had only worn one,
Of those children the bears had not torn one;
But God can easier make the bears, sir,
Than caps of artificial hair, sir;
So, little boy, beware, beware, sir,
Or the man of God without the hair, sir,
Will look at you and "cuss" and swear, sir;
And out will jump the two she-bears, sir,
And tear, and tear, and tear, and tear, sir,
Till you had wished you had sauced some sinner,
And left the bears without their dinner;
But I digress—let us go back,
And keep along the subject's track.
The whole is like the second,
A kind of peruke reckoned;
If from the whole, as I hav said,
You draw reversed a metallic thread,
Lo! punko, dunko, munko mine!
All that is left is a youthful swine.

OVERTON, GA.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I do not get a chance to read THE TRUTH SEEKER often, because papa does not take it; but when I do read it, I always turn to the Children's Corner first, and appreciate it highly. My mother and father are both members of the church. Mamma says it is a sin to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, although it is so interesting she cannot help reading it whenever she sees it. But mamma has told me that I can write to you, and I hope you will publish my letter. I am sure you would publish it if you knew how much pleasure it would giv me.

The Children's Corner has such nice stories in it. I wish I had "The Story Hour," because I like so much to read. I am eleven years old. I hav a sweet little sister, four years old, named Pearl. Do you care if I write again? I wish some of THE TRUTH SEEKER cousins would write to me.

Your little friend, NANNIE FAMBROUGH.

[We are very much pleased to hav a letter from Nannie. We giv her a hearty welcome to the Corner, and hope she will write again some time. Perhaps some of our little girls will write to her soon, and we hope her papa may take THE TRUTH SEEKER on trial, so that his little girl may hav the pleasure of reading the Children's Corner every week. With kind regards to her papa, mamma, herself, and little Pearl, we trust ever to be the children's friend.—EDITOR C. C.]

GATES, TENN., Aug. 21, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I read THE TRUTH SEEKER, examin the sketches produced by Heston, and believe them to be a better way to place the superstitious views of orthodoxy before the people than any other.

What a farce is the case of C. B. Reynolds! Can it be possible that such ignoramuses yet exist in "America?" Did these people hav such fools for parents? Every boy and girl writing for your Corner should cry, Shame!

It only proves what religion would do if it could hav the power, and I am glad there are so many intelligent men and women to defend Mr. Reynolds.

Please giv address of Geo. Sam. Newton.

Your friend, BERTIE WINEMAN.

A NIHILISTIC ROMANCE.

By N. G. TCHERNYCHEWSKY. With a portrait of the Author. Translated by BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Mapping Out the Brain.

A remarkable surgical operation was described at the meeting of the British Medical Association, held on the 13th inst., by Surgeon Horsley, of the Bloomsbury National Hospital for the Paralyzed and Epileptic. The patient upon whom the operation had been performed was exhibited by the successful operator. The case is a very interesting one, because it shows how great progress has been made recently in brain surgery and in the art of locating the seat of disease at the surface of the brain before the surgeon's instruments are used. It also shows once more and in a striking way how much has been gained for the human race by experiments upon living animals.

The patient exhibited by Dr. Horsley was treated for epilepsy. It was decided that his skull should be opened in order that the cause of irritation might be removed. But at what point should the opening be made? Was it possible for the physician to locate accurately the position of the morbid growth before the surgeon should begin his work? A spot on the skull was pointed out, although there were no external indications by which the physician could be guided or assisted. At that spot the skull was opened. There a tumor was found imbedded in the brain substance. This tumor, with a portion of the brain surrounding it, was removed. The cause of irritation having been taken away, the patient ceased to be an epileptic. Before the operation was performed he had been a great sufferer, and both the frequency and the severity of his fits had been increasing. When he was exhibted at Brighton, one month after the operation, the fits had not returned. Two other patients, whose skulls had been opened for the removal of diseased structure or morbid growth, were shown at the same meeting by Dr. Horsley, but in these cases the physician had been assisted in locating the seat of disturbance on the surface of the brain by external marks, caused by injury in one case and by trephining in the other. The surgeon's treatment of these patients was successful, but for obvious reasons the first case was far more remarkable.

In the first case the point at which the skull should be opened was determined solely by the fact that the patient's fits began in the muscles which act upon the left thumb. Knowing this, the attending physician also knew that the region of the brain which excites or governs the movements of those muscles was irritated by something that should be removed. He knew under what part of the skull that part of the brain surface could be found. He pointed out the part of the skull which covered that part of the brain; the surgeon removed the bony covering; the tumor was revealed and taken out.

The art of locating accurately in this way the seat of disturbance has been developed by a long series of experiments upon the brains of living animals. It is one of the greatest of the results that hav been attained by what is commonly called vivisection—a broad term which covers experiments of many kinds, some of which do not necessarily fall under a strict definition of the word. By the side of this a t the art of surgery has been developed and improved by means of vivisection. Ability to locate the irritating growth and ability to remove it without killing the patient hav been obtained alike in great measure by experiments upon living animals. The results are already of great value to mankind.

If we were trying to show that vivisection is justifiable, and is required for the development of the healing arts, we should point out many other most valuable discoveries that hav been made by means of such experiments. It may be that some experiments that are made upon animals are made unnecessarily or frivolously, for unworthy motivs, in improper ways, or without due regard to the results that should be aimed at. We do not see why a physician should be allowed to torture and maim countless animals for the sole purpose of getting so-called evidence to be used by a rich railroad company in opposing the claims of passengers who hav been injured on its lines. Such a use of vivisection was recently made by a physician in a neighboring state. But a careful examination of the history and results of vivisection, if made with intelligence and without prejudice, will prove that experiments among animals hav been of very great service in the development of the arts by which human suffering is removed or alleviated, and valuable human lives are saved. The case of Dr. Horsley's epileptic patient furnishes a remarkable addition to the literature of this subject.—Times.

Purcell and His Victims.

The creditors of the late Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, hav not received any of their money, and charge that neither his ecclesiastical successor nor any of the priesthood show any disposition to aid them in its recovery. Naturally indignant in the extreme at their treatment, they hav addressed letters detailing their grievances to all the leading Catholic prelates in the country, and even to the pope himself, and demanding redress. They declare that if they do not get it they will withdraw from the church, which has taken their money and will not repay it, and they are obviously in earnest. The whole amount, with interest, is more than $4,000,000, a great part of it the small wages of servants and manual laborers. Many of the creditors hav nearly starved, and some of them hav committed suicide from their losses. Archbishop Purcell had no more knowledge of business than an infant, and did not assume to hav. His brother, Edward Purcell, took charge of all the funds, and was believed to be an excellent financier. He paid interest on deposits, but actually kept no accounts, and had no idea of whom or what he owed. If he had been an imbecil, he could not hav been more incapable than he showed himself to be. And yet he was generally esteemed a man of intellect and sagacity. He seemed to think that he would never be called on to account for the money he had received. There was no scandal about it. The principal had all been expended in building churches, orphan asylums, schoolhouses, and educational and charitable institutions. Nevertheless, the church for whose benefit it has been expended refuses to make any part of it good. It is incredible that it should take such a position. The Catholic church has, from its very foundation, been begging on the whole world, has drawn into its coffers millions of millions, and now turns a deaf ear to the appeals of hundreds of poor men and women, who merely ask for their own, spent, as the priests claim, for the glorification of God. It cannot afford to do this. The rights of humanity and civilization will not allow its prelates to ignore so manifestly just a demand. The church will be compelled to make restitution. It is an encouraging sign that the suffering Catholics hav the independence to insist on their rights. They hav always been in the habit of submitting blindly and obeying implicitly. The idea of the laity threatening is a strange innovation; hitherto it has been the church. When it thundered, the knees of myriads of worshipers knocked together and they prayed to be spared. And to dare to address with anger and menace even the sovereign pontiff! Times hav indeed changed, and men are steadily freeing themselvs from the shackles of superstition. The last place where a spark of independence would be looked for would be among the poorer classes of Catholics; and lo! there it has at last been found.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

ELEMENTS OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY

FOR

HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2,000 years B.C. on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Slenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixon.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable. It may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

A CHRISTIAN or Campbellite minister named George W. Hortzclaw, aged forty years, has been convicted at Heber, Ark., of forgery and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. He became a Methodist minister at the age of twenty-eight. He married three times, deserting his wives in succession. He was in the midst of a successful revival in Franklin county, and had immersed several converts in a stream near the scene of his labors when arrested on the charge of forgery. He protested his innocence, and considerable excitement ensued among his followers. When his case was called in the Cleburne county circuit court he entered a plea of guilty and accepted the five years' sentence. He did this to avoid other complications, a sheriff from Illinois having arrived during the trial with a warrant for his arrest on the charge of bigamy.

of Thought.

the ideas of God held by the more sensible than Paul's. ed in the flesh and blood neheir conceptions of him were n of nature's forces. If Paul ture instead of God, he would correct. Nature is truly the , and the power of motion, and is at all times near every living being. This ever-present power was never made nor devised, while the God Paul believed in was devised in the minds of ignorant men.—D. M. Bennett.

POPE'S view of his own career suggests the curious problem, how it came to pass that so harmless a man should be the butt of so many hostilities. How could any man be angry with a writer of gentle pastorals and versified love-letters? The answer of Pope was, that this was the normal state of things. "The life of a wit," he says, in the preface to his works, "is a warfare upon earth," and the warfare results from the hatred of men of genius natural to the dull. Had anyone else made such a statement, Pope would hav seen its resemblance to the complaint of the one reasonable juryman overpowered by eleven obstinate fellows. But we may admit that an extremely sensitiv nature is a bad qualification for a public career. A man who ventures into the throng of competitors without a skin will be tortured by every touch, and suffer the more if he turns to retaliate. — Leslie Stephen's Pope.

THE civilized world has outgrown Christianity, and is now in the condition of the Roman empire in the pagan days. A cold-hearted Infidelity above, a sordid superstition below; a school of Plutarchs who endeavor to reconcile the fables of a barbarous people with the facts of science and the lofty conceptions of philosophy; a multitude of augurs who sometimes smile when they meet, but who more often feel inclined to Entering the church in their youth, before men. minds were formed, they discover too late what it is that they adore, and since they cannot tell the truth, and let their wives and children starve, they are forced to lead a life which is a lie. What a state of society is this in which Freethinker is a term of abuse, and in which doubt is regarded as a sin! . . Worship is a conventionality; churches are bonnet-shows, places of assignation, shabby-genteel salons, where the parochial "At Home" is given, and respectable tradesmen exhibit their daughters in the wooden stalls. . . We are now in the dreary desert which separates two ages of belief. A new era is at hand.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

MILTON read with selection, and "meditated," says Aubray, what he read. His practice conformed to the principle he has himself laid down in the oft-quoted lines (Paradise Regained, iv, 322):

Who reads
Incessantly, and to his reading brings not
A spirit and judgment equal or superior,
Uncertain and unsettled still remains,
Deep versed in books, and shallow in himself.
—Pattison's Milton.

TRUE Scotchman as Carlyle was, with all his fiery emotions and prejudices in favor of the bigoted Presbyterianism of his parents, of his mother especially, whom he idolized; and fond as he was of spicing his talk with the imagery and aphorisms of scripture, still he, at a quite early day in his life, repudiated the orthodoxy of Scotland, and declined to be a professional mouthpiece of it in a pulpit, where his mother hoped to see him. He would do anything to please her, but he could not make such a sacrifice of his deepest convictions as compliance in that matter would hav involved. But he always had a kindness for Christianity—not doctrinal, sophisticated, ecclesiastical Christianity, but for the primitiv, genuin article. To him it was the "worship of sorrow," as it was to his master, Goethe—the religion of reverence to that which is beneath us. "The temple of Christianity," he says, "founded some eighteen centuries ago, now lies in ruins, overgrown with jungle, the habitation of doleful creatures." He saw in the founder of Christianity man morally at his highest and best, and no so-called God, or son of God, and vulgar miracle-monger.—B. W. Ball.

THE worst ill service you can do to the violent is to show them that they may work their wicked will unpunished and unchecked by the natural instincts of humanity. It is to make them "masters of the situation," to encourage them by success and impunity, to enthrone them as monarchs of the world. It is to put goodness under the foot of evil, and so to drive back the progress of humanity; . . it is, too, to harden the sinner in his wrong, the criminal in his crime, and the brute in his brutality; to teach him to proceed in outrages and iniquities that pay so well. Hundreds that would hav been stopped at the outset of their criminal career by prompt and timely resistance are led on by the impunity which submission secures till habits of crime are formed, and recovery becomes hopeless. Non-resistance, again, becomes connivance and complicity in wrong.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

Notes and Clippings.

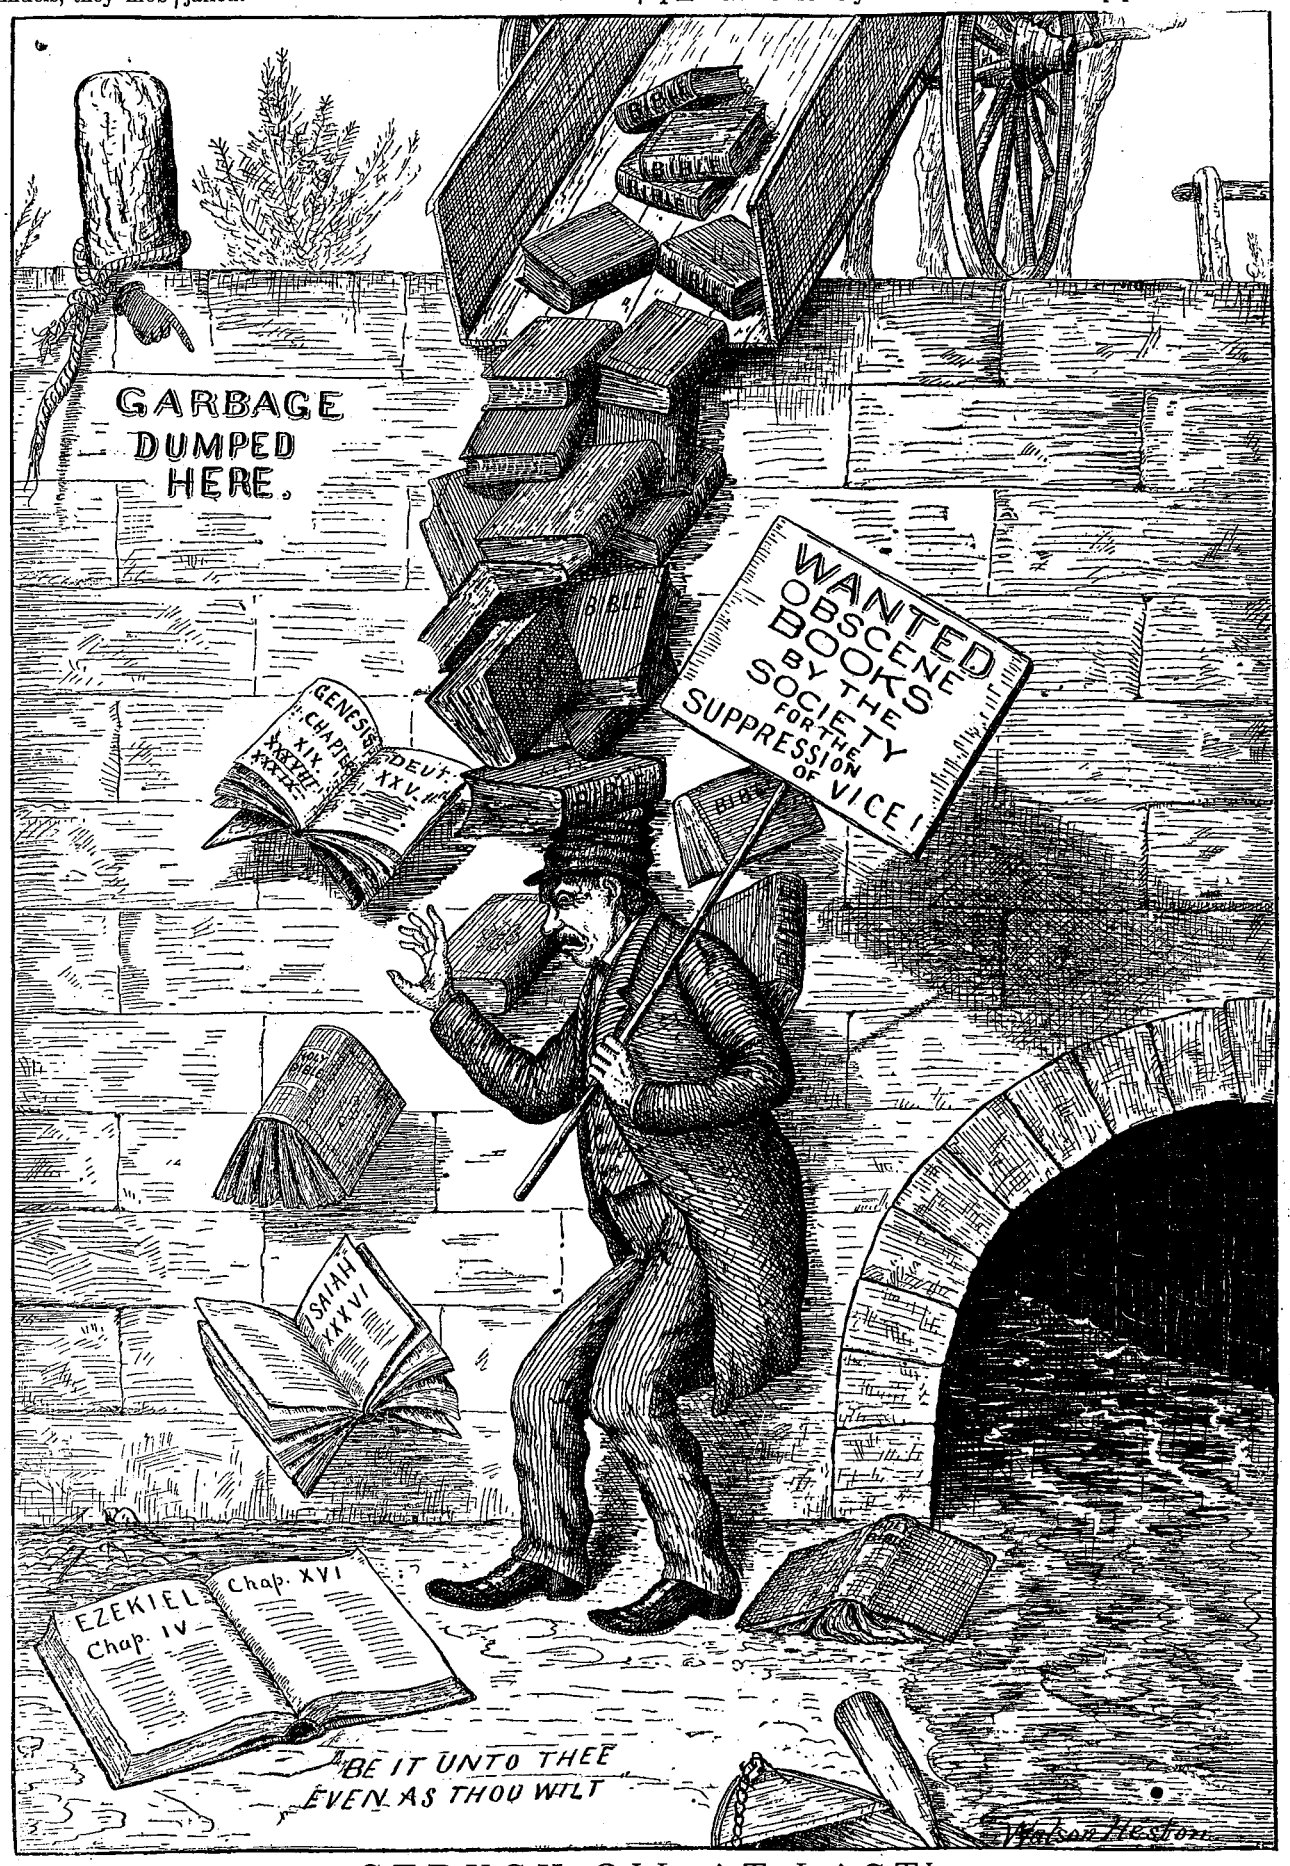
IN New Jersey the Catholics and Protestants unite in mobbing Infidels; while in Ireland, where there are no Infidels, they mob each other. — Independent Pulpit.

IN a convict camp in Georgia there are eighty-six negro convicts, of whom thirty-five are preachers.

AN orthodox preacher in Storm Lake, Ia., thinks that the Universalist preacher of the same place is objectionable. So he prayed the other day in church that the Lord would either change the heart of the Universalist, or kill him.

THEY tell in Brattleboro, Vt., of a clergyman who refused to take meat of his butcher because it had been killed on Sunday. A few days later the preacher told the butcher that he wanted some meat. "I havn't any to sell you," said that conscientious man. "I hav stopped receiving money that is earned on Sunday."

DEPRECATING the fashionable organ solos called interludes during the singing of hymns, the Religious Herald says: "As these interludes are often thrown, they remind us of the remark of the Scotch divine who said, 'It used to be "Great God, attend while Zion sings," but now all attend while Jim fiddles.'"



A COLPORTEUR of the American Bible Society found in Riley, Wis., the other day the son of a Methodist clergyman who had no Bible in his house. He wouldn't buy one, and wouldn't accept one as a gift, and when the colporteur intimated that he'd leave one anyway, the bad man became very angry and put the Bible man out of the house.

A CITIZEN of Olneyville, R. I., bragged that he could get a drink on Sunday, and to prove it, confidentially asked a doctor for something to brace him up. The doctor knew the man, and wrote a prescription calling for aqua pura; the druggist saw the joke, and put up the water in a flat bottle, and charged a round price for it. The buyer's remarks when he tested the dose are not reportable.

THERE is a Catholic monastery in West Hoboken where all manner of diseases are claimed to be cured by faith and the application of a bit of bone which was once a portion of the anatomy of Paul the Apostle. There is also a Chinese theologian on Mott street, in this city, who accomplishes equally surprising cures by burning paper and killing fowls.

A LONDON clergyman wanted to raise the sum of £1,200, and he converted himself into a "sandwich man," carrying a couple of boards setting forth his desire. He obtained 2s. and 6d. and narrowly escaped being jailed.

THE Indian question is now whether Chief Geronimo shall be hanged or not. As he has not been charged with making incendiary speeches, it is thought there is hope for him, though he has been slaughtering the settlers of Arizona for some years.

STRUCK OIL AT LAST!

AGENT OF THE S. S. V.—This is the place I long hav sought—And mourned because I found it not.

THE excitement caused two or three months ago, says the Independent, by the desertion of the Old Catholic cause in Rome by Savarese, and his humble submission to the Papal authorities, has been overshadowed recently by the return of Paul Grassi to the Roman Catholic fold. He had for twelve years been a Protestant, and of late had been in connection with the Baptist denomination. As in the case of Savarese, money considerations were the chief persuader in the step. Grassi had a remarkable gift for getting into debt, and when the Baptist leaders in Rome, after having paid large sums for him on a number of occasions, refused to do so again, he found it opportune to "pervert" back into the church of Rome. Grassi has, however, got to stand on trial before the civil courts. When returning to his old church, he simply discarded his wife and threw her on the public charities, and the attempt is being made to compel him to see to her wants.

A ST. PAUL clergyman is reported as saying that if Jesus Christ "run a carpenter-shop here in this city there are fully one-half of our church-members who drive up to our churches in their fine carriages would not speak to him. He could not get social recognition unless he lived on Summit avenue, or belonged to a club." The Globe says that there is more truth than poetry in the remark.

THE Denison, Texas Gazetteer says: "To put it mildly, the editor of Our Battle Flag, a new paper published by Rev. Tynes, of this city, shows bad taste in classing Infidels with gamblers and fallen women. There are a good many 'Infidels' in Denison, but so far as our acquaintwith them extends they will compare favorably in moral character with 'believers.'"

A CORRESPONDENT of the Churchman thinks that the baptism of infants should not be deferred until the mother is able to come to church with them. Such a practice is, in his opinion, "unchurchly, modern, American, and ultra-Protestant." Moreover, it endangers the salvation of the child's soul, as there can be no certainty of salvation without baptism.

ACCORDING to a table published in London, which, the Churchman says, may be depended upon as sufficiently accurate, the numerical strength of the leading religious bodies among all English-speaking people throughout the world is as follows: Congregationalists, 5,750,000; Baptists of all descriptions, 8,195,000; Presbyterians of all descriptions, 10,650,000; Methodists of all descriptions, 16,000,000; Episcopalians, 21,305,000.

CITY ASSESSOR WILLIAM A. KELLY says that the loss from the Charleston earthquake will readily reach $10,000,000. The taxable property aggregates $22,000,000. Then there is the non-assessable property, churches, schools, and charitable institutions, aggregating $10,000,000. As the greater portion of the property destroyed was inherited by old families who hav no surplus means, it is believed that only a portion will be rebuilt.

IN the city of Charleston God's recent work did over a million dollars' damage to churches. This is too bad, for it will spoil the effect of all the pretty Sunday-school stories which may be told about the earthquake and the "hand of providence" in it. An earthquake that will knock the homes of people into a heap and leave the churches standing should be prayed for, because this one has plainly been managed in a bungling manner.— Winsted Press.

The Church and Its Influence.

A believer in the so-called divine revelation must necessarily be intolerant, because he believes that it emanated from God and must therefore be perfect. Anything contrary to the revelation must be wrong and therefore will meet his displeasure.

I wonder why the Christian cannot see that the Mormon, the Mohammedan, or the Brahman must necessarily hav the same confidence in his particular revelation that he has in his.

The Christian believes that God will punish every man who goes contrary to his "will." The "will" of God is the Bible, as the Christian understands it, and when he takes the punishment into his own hands he thinks he is only carrying out the purpose of God. Every Christian persecution has had its root in this belief.

If I believed the Bible to be the word of God, I would hang a witch at sight; I would stone a man to death who picked up sticks on the Sabbath; I would burn every work on astronomy and geology, and their authors should share the same fate.

I would plant myself on the Bible and say, "This book is God's holy will to man. God knows everything, and if it had been necessary for man to know more than his 'will' contains, God would hav put it down in this book." I would oppose every improvement, knowing God would hav spoken about it if it had been agreeable to his "will."

If a man should speak lightly of the account of creation, or Noah's big boat and floating menagerie, or Jonah's wonderful sea voyage, or the feats of Samson, I would burn him as a blasphemer.

I hav no doubt that in the main every woman who has been publicly whipped; every witch that has been hanged; every heretic who has been burnt, has been whipped, hanged, or burnt by those who thought they were doing the "will of God."

The difficulty is to make the Christian understand the difference between ignorant men and a wise God. The most ridiculous things written by the most ignorant men in semi-barbarous times are to the Christian the word of an omniscient God.

It was impossible for Bible writers to anticipate the civilization, wants, and condition of the people of today; and hence the Christian is chained back to the ignorance of the times in which his Bible originated, and he fights the reformer who tries to break his chains. Nothing suits him like the mental darkness of old Bible times, because he believes such darkness to be in accord with the "will" of God. With such belief, how can the Christian progress only as he is pushed along by outside force?

How can a man believe in the science of geology and at the same time believe in the "six days of creation," as laid down in the book of Genesis? How can he teach the science of astronomy and at the same time teach that the jumble in Genesis is a "divine revelation?" The Bible writers knew nothing about the science of astronomy or geology, yet to the Christian their ignorance is divine knowledge.

The Christian is just what his Bible makes him. There are laws of mind as well as laws of matter. He would not be proscriptiv if he knew it, but the Bible writers hav made his God a tyrant, and he is all the time trying to carry out the "will" of his God.

When he reads in his Bible, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv," instead of regarding the command as the vaporings of a superstitious fanatic, he firmly believes it to be the word of God; and if by anything which may transpire he comes to believe that a person is a witch, he will kill the person at sight.

The difficulty is to see things as the Christian sees them—to view them from a Christian's standpoint. When he reads in his Bible that women are to be "ripped up alive," and helpless children murdered, he sees no brutality in it. To him they were enemies to God and justly deserved the cruelties practiced upon them.

He does not reflect that, instead of such horrid commands coming from God, they were issued by a military savage. He does not think that if God wanted to wreak his vengeance on innocent babies which he himself had created he would not be compelled to call on a lot of half-savage wretches to execute his will, when one turn of the screw of his almighty power would blast them all out of existence. The history of the Christian religion is simply the philosophy of cause and effect. The cruelties, persecutions, and ignorance engendered are the natural outgrowth of Christian belief.

If a man believe that God has written a book, everything in that book will be "divine will" to him, whether right or wrong. If, instead of being written by God, the book was written by ignorant men, with all the instincts of brutality, ignorance and brutality will characterize the readers to a greater or less extent. A period of a thousand years, known as the Dark Ages, marked by every act of brutality, persecution, and misery, when the whole of Europe was subjected to the thumb-pressure of Christianity, is ample proof of the truth which I utter.

A belief in a divine revelation must necessarily antagonize every attempt at improvement, and act as a clog to mental development. There will ever be a conflict between the expansiv force of the human intellect and blind faith in an infallible revelation. The human mind must be lifted above the delusiv belief in so-called divine revelation before its powers can be known or calculated. Gods and "divine revelations" are always stationary; whatever is perfect cannot improve. The mind of man is expansiv, ever advancing, ever exploring new fields and making new conquests when left to its natural bent.

So long as man is tied down to gods and revelations, so long as he is frightened by demons and ghosts, he is a slave. The first step to be taken to elevate him is to teach him that he is free—that there are no angry gods to fear, no big devils to dread. The enslaved mind can no more be developed than the caged eagle can exhibit its powers of flight.

Gods and revelations, demons and ghosts, must be left behind; the well-being of the race should most occupy the minds of men. So long as the mind is chained down to musty creeds, man is in an iron jacket; so long as his mind is swayed by ecclesiastics, and held in fear of hell, he is a slave.

The great lesson for Christians to learn is that they cannot sin against a being whom they cannot injure, and who cannot suffer. Every sin which it is possible for man to commit must be committed against some being who or which can suffer. He can no more sin against the tenants of the sky than the pope's bull could affect the comet. The Christian will torture, and roast, and hang his fellow-man, who is capable of suffering the most excruciating pangs, yet is ever afraid of sinning against God, whom it is impossible for him to affect either for good or evil. Ecclesiastics held all Europe in the midnight of mental darkness for more than a thousand years. They caused the torture and murder of untold thousands of human beings. A happy day for the race when the energies of such men are directed to the welfare of human beings, instead of trying to benefit imaginary beings in the skies. In the morning of life every man ought to dedicate himself to the service of the race, and not to the gods. Who says the gods can not take care of themselvs without man's help? But ecclesiastics hav turned the steps of men in the wrong direction, and sent them after the gods in order to rob them on the way. Not only this, but, Professor Draper says, "the hands which are raised to the Most Merciful are steeped in blood."

These Christian vandals put the torch to nearly all the ancient literature, and well-nigh severed the chain which linked us to the intellectual wealth of ancient times.

Every time science storms the citadel of divine revelation, the church attempts to make these revelations harmonize with the discoveries of the scientists. New interpretations of the scriptures become necessary as new discoveries are made. Many things which hav been regarded with veneration for hundreds of years are now regarded as myth and fable. The hottest kind of a brimstone hell has been tempered down to sheol; and the devil is not as black and sooty as he was when I was a boy and went fishing on Sunday. Ecclesiastics hav been compelled to yield to the progressiv spirit of the age in some degree, but it has been only with a death struggle.

The policy of the church has ever been to strangle every progressiv movement if it could. If it could not choke the life out of the movement, it did the next best thing it could, viz., to cover it with her protecting wing, and finally profit by the hypocritical claim that it had its origin in the church. The church claims all the glory of the temperance and antislavery reforms, yet many still living can remember full well what bitter opposition these reforms met from the church in an early day. Hasten the day when the last vestige of superstition shall be swept from the minds of men, and all shall join with alacrity in any movement which shall tell for the interests of the race! The ignorance and persecutions of the Dark Ages, when the church had everything its own way, are no secret to the student of history. That the church burnt Bruno, and imprisoned and persecuted Copernicus and Galileo, no one will deny. That nearly every new discovery and improvement has been opposed by the church is a secret to no one. And yet the first time the Rev. Mr. Talmage is moved by the "holy spirit" to do the "Highland Fling" on the heavenly spring-board he will declare that we are indebted to the church for every improvement and reform. And the next Sunday, to show that he is abreast with the times, every file-leader of a pious flock will repeat the stale lie.

Christianity has never been noted for building mental lighthouses for the world. The bat and the owl can best secure their prey in the night. Ecclesiastics hav been most successful in their schemes in the darkest days of the world.

From long observation I am satisfied that Christians know but little about the rise and early history of their own religion. As briefly as possible I will giv what I know about the circumstances attending its introduction and its rise.

By the conquests of Rome many peoples were brought into close relations with each other who had been strangers before. Their various systems of religion began to be studied and investigated. The result was a partial or total disbelief of them all.

The rich and high-born were slaves to their appetites and corrupted desires; the poor were slaves to the rich.

The halls of the rich glittered with gold; power was worshiped; little virtue remained beyond the reach of gold; women were dissolute; successful warfare confiscated goods and lands; the taxation of conquered provinces secured all that toil and trade could produce.

How natural it would be for those oppressed peoples, made up of the various nationalities which Rome had conquered, to lend a listening ear to the universal doctrin of benevolence and brotherly love—a doctrin in harmony with the idea of a "universal father," whose equal children all the nations of the earth are!

There seems to hav been a variety of circumstances which dove-tailed together to open up to a man of genius and a true reformer an opportunity of leaving a lasting impression in the world. Such were the times when Jesus appeared, and such the doctrin he taught.

Is it any wonder the poor flocked around him? Is it any wonder that they loved him with a tenderness almost unknown in the history of human transactions?

He taught a doctrin which elevated the poor above their oppressors. Is it any wonder that they regarded him almost with veneration?

But the priesthood (as has always been the case) derived their substance mainly from the rich, and the teachings of Jesus were detrimental to their interests, and they denounced both Jesus and his doctrins to the Roman governor, and clamored for his execution as an innovator, and to satisfy their demands he was given over to persecution and death. But the doctrins which he taught outlived their author. His followers organized. The doctrins which their loving master taught were dearer to them than their friends, houses, and lands. The little they had they put into a common stock for the support of the poor. The followers formed churches; the churches formed leagues. Everything tended to a crystallization of power, and ended in the hierarchy of Rome.

In their weakness they were persecuted; in their strength they met their opposers with fire and sword. Paul was the great character in the early days of Christianity. He persecuted the Christians with the malignity of a tiger. After what was called his conversion, he manifested the disposition of a tiger toward those who opposed the new religion which he was trying to build up. Wherever Roman arms had triumphed, the way was paved for the reception of the new religion, and it spread rapidly.

A Christian government grew up inside the civil government, and soon controled it. Constantine, seeing the power which could be wielded through the influence of the new religion, and willing to take any advantage which could be utilized, after murdering those of his own household, mounted the throne of the Cæsars as the first Christian emperor.

The new religion was now in condition to grant place, power, and profit. The vilest worldlings now flocked around the standard. Pagans formed so great a part of their number that the ear-marks of Paganism were transferred to the Christian doctrin, and hav never been eradicated to this day.

Such, briefly, is an outline of the circumstances which gave rise to the Christian religion.

If Christianity were to-day what it was before it became a power, all Liberals would be on the side of Christianity, because it taught the broad doctrin of a common humanity. But like a stream starting from a pure fountain and running through filth and mire, Christianity became adulterated with other systems, was made the highway to power and profit, and was finally prostituted to the lowest purposes.

As nearly as I hav been able to learn, the teachings of the early Christians were almost identical with the principles now advocated by so-called Infidels—fraternal feelings, a broad, brotherly love, and a just regard for the feelings of others.

The early Christians taught nothing about the fall of man, or a redeemer, or a resurrection, but "peace on earth and good will to men."

Tertullian says of the early Christians: "They acknowledge but one republic, but it is the whole world. They constitute one body, worship one God [not three], and all look forward to eternal happiness. At the end of every month each contributes if he will, but the money is not spent in eating or drinking, but in feeding the poor, in comforting the children who are destitute of parents and of goods, in helping old men, in assisting those who hav lost by misfortune and those who are doomed to the mines or shut up in prison."

I can find in the writings of Thomas Paine sentiments almost identical with this teaching, and no intelligent Liberal will take exception thereto. He further says: "The object of a Christian life is innocence, justice, patience, temperance, and chastity." Good Infidel doctrin, every word.

Well had it been for the whole world, especially for the intellectual development of Europe, if the practice of Christianity had been squared to its early teachings.

As Christians multiplied, and as their religion grew in consequence, they became more anxious to acquire power than to preserve their primitiv purity. Although it had become strong enough to deck Constantine in the imperial purple, it was not strong enough to entirely obliterate paganism.

The old pagan temples had not yet been forgotten and the old heathen deities were still present in the dreams of the people. Constantine, entirely void of principle, and willing to cherish any system which would give him prestige and power, allowed the old heathen notions to be incorporated in the new religion. It was an attempt to conciliate worldly power by adopting their ideas and practices.

Draper says: "The heathen rites were adopted; images and relics were introduced into the churches and worshiped after the fashion of the heathen gods. It was given out that prodigies and miracles were seen at certain places, as in heathen times. There was a multiplication of temples, altars, and penitential garments. The festival of the purification of the Virgin was invented to remove the uneasiness of the heathen converts, on account of their loss of the feasts of Pan. The worship of images, fragments of the cross, bones, nails, and other relics was cultivated.

"As centuries passed the paganization became more complete. Festivals were instituted sacred to the memory of the spear which pierced the side of Christ, the nails which fastened him to the cross, and the crown of thorns which he wore."

If all the sacred relics which hav been exhibited could be collected together, it is doubtful if there is a building in the world which would contain them. There hav been true crosses enough on exhibition, first and last, to bridge the Hudson. Crowns and thorns and spears and hair and nails enough hav been used to dupe the unthinking to fill all the rookeries in the world.

Few Christians realize that these relics were first introduced as a sop for paganism, and that half of the mummery in the churches was introduced for the same purpose.

Bishop Newton says: "In short, almost the whole of paganism is converted and applied to popery. The one is manifestly formed upon the same plan as the other, so that there is not only a conformity, but a uniformity, in the worship of ancient and modern, of Christian and heathen, Rome."

It has been seen that Christianity had become strong enough to put a nominal Christian on the throne. Presto, change! The mild and persuasiv teaching of the gentle Jesus is no longer the order of the day. The humanitarian doctrins which he preached are abandoned when a hierarchy is to be built up. Thenceforth whatever power Christianity could wield was hurled against its opposers, whether they appeared openly, with written or oral arguments, or whether they planned secretly against it.

All writings against the Christian religion were prohibited. Constantine even went so far as to pronounce the sentence of death upon anyone finding the writings of Arius if he did not destroy them. Henceforth any measure was to be considered legitimate (including lying and deceit) which would build up the Christian religion. JOHN PECK.

Patience.

The world is full of good women—of true, earnest, helpful, loving women, who liv in quiet homes far from the busy crowds, making no visible marks along the great highways of life, but nevertheless quietly impressing their personality upon the home circle, neighbors, and friends around them. Such a woman was Patience Taber. You all remember her as the sister-in-law of Mr. Masquerier, of Brooklyn. I made my home at their house for some weeks while hunting after the unfindable ghosts, the mediums, and the phenomena. While I found nothing I called real as regards those three things, I did find a rare and beautiful woman—beautiful in all that makes a true friend, a loving sister, a good home-maker, and a universal mother to all around her. Though 'way along in the eighties, she had never married, and yet she was full of love, romance, poetry, and almost girlish enthusiasm.

She was intelligent, Liberal, and practical; a good reader and talker, and enthusiastic in her love of reform. I never before met a woman who so attracted me on so short an acquaintance. I miss her as I would some near and dear relativ.

She was her own housekeeper, and was as mother, sister, and care-taker of Mr. Masquerier, who is so nearly blind that he can see nothing that is not close to him, and so needs a woman's kindly hand ever near him. These two had lived in constant companionship as brother and sister for thirty-eight long years, and you will all realize how entirely alone he must feel in his old age, for he is eighty-five years old, and not a relativ near him.

It is well for him that he is wedded to his books and work, as they will keep mind and hands employed and make life useful as well as enjoyable; for we always enjoy the work that is nearest our heart. His hobbies are, first, the idea of dividing the world up in farmsteads that shall be inalienable, so that all will hav homes and work and food.

He has also invented what he thinks is the only perfect alphabet and key for all languages, and a code of Rights and Wrongs.

His whole aim seems to be to do good work for coming generations, and Patience was his helper and friend. He has also erected a fine monument at Cypress Hills Cemetery. I told you about it in my letter, while relating the incidents of my trip.

There his wife sleeps, and there sleeps the good, and loving, and motherly Patience, and in a few short years Masquerier will sleep there also, and strangers will pause to read the inscriptions on the stone, just as Patience read those on D. M. Bennett's monument for Mr. Masquerier and Elmina, when we stood by the old hero's grave.

In this age of labor troubles and community experiences, I think Liberals will do well to read Masquerier's book on "Sociology." It is cloth-bound, and worth $2. I will send it for 50 cents, so as to help get it circulated. Friends who read it will learn to appreciate the old man while he is yet alive. The book is full of essays on temperance and all kinds of reforms, and contains short biographies of Liberals, and poems by Mr. Masquerier, by Annie (his wife), and by Patience's brothers. Let us circulate it and all other Liberal books, and do all we can to encourage the living workers while they are with us.

Who Wrote the Declaration?

Undoubtedly Jefferson was the creator, designer, and producer, and no one else. At one time he writes, among his private papers, that he has often reflected whether his life has been of service to mankind. He then sums up what he has done. Among other things, he claims "the Declaration of Independence" as his work. Would he thus testify falsely to himself?

At another time, in reply to a letter of Dr. Priestly, who had written to him stating the many great services he had rendered mankind, Jefferson says: "In one thing you hav made a mistake. I had no hand in making the Constitution. After it was made, I suggested certain amendments that were afterward adopted. I was not in the United States when the Constitution was made; did not see it till some time after."

Here he does not disclaim that he was the author of the Declaration.

But if anyone has the least doubt as to the authorship of the Declaration, let him read an article composed by Jefferson, on or before August, 1774, entitled, "A Summary View of the Rights of British America." Jefferson drew this up as a set of instructions to the first delegation of Virginia to Congress in August, 1874. (See Note C, Appendix to Vol. I. of Jefferson's Works, by Washington.) Anyone accustomed to composition knows that, after he has studied and written at length on a subject, if he shall be called on to frame an article, on some more than usually important occasion, on the same subject, his previous labors enable him to grasp the whole matter and express, sometimes, whole lines in a word or two. This terseness evinces his perfect mastery of the subject. In this Summary we see the Declaration in embryo. I will giv a few lines from it. I abridge and occasionally transpose:

Resolved, That an humble and dutiful address be presented to his majesty, begging leave to lay before him the united complaints of his subjects in America—complaints excited by the many unwarrantable encroachments and usurpations attempted to be made by the legislature of one part of the empire upon the rights which God and the laws hav given equally and independently to all. To represent that these his states hav often individually made application to his imperial throne to obtain some redress of their injured rights; to none of which was even an answer condescended. Humbly to hope that this address penned in the language of truth shall obtain from his majesty a more respectful acceptance. . . . And in order that these our rights as well as the invasions of them may be more fully laid before his majesty, to take a view of them from the origin and first settlement of these countries.

Our ancestors were the free inhabitants of the British dominions in Europe, and possessed the right which nature has given to all men of departing from the country in which chance, not choice, has placed them; of going in quest of new habitations, and there establishing new societies under such regulations as to them shall seem most likely to promote public happiness.

A respectful acceptance of our petition his majesty will think we hav reason to expect when he reflects that we are seeking, not favors, but rights; and that he himself is no more than the chief officer of the people appointed by the laws, circumscribed by definit powers to assist in working the great machine of government erected for their use. . . . From the nature of things, every society must at all times possess within itself the sovereign powers of legislation. The feelings of human nature revolt against the supposition of a state so situated as that it may not in any emergency provide against dangers which perhaps threaten immediate ruin. While these bodies exist to whom the people hav delegated the powers of legislation, they alone possess it; but when they are dissolved by the lopping off one or more of their branches, the power reverts to the people; who may use it to unlimited extent. We forbear to trace consequences further—the dangers are conspicuous with which this practice is replete. ["Prudence will dictate"—see Declaration.]

Single acts of tyranny may be ascribed to the accidental opinion of a day; but a series of oppressions, begun at a distinguished period, and pursued unalterably through every change of ministers, too plainly prove a deliberate, systematical plan of reducing us to slavery. . . .

Thus hav we hastened through the reigns which hav preceded his majesty's, during which the violation of our rights was less alarming, because repeated at more distant intervals, than the rapid and bold succession of injuries which is likely to distinguish the present from all other periods of American history. Scarcely hav our minds been able to emerge from the astonishment into which one stroke of parliamentary thunder has involved us before another, more heavy and alarming, is fallen on us.

That the act entitled (to grant duties).
That the act entitled (Stamp act).
That the act (declaring the right of Parliament).
And one other (duties on paper).

These form one connected chain of usurpation, the subject of frequent remonstrances, to which no reply has been even condescended.

We next proceed to consider the conduct of his majesty as holding the executiv power, those previously mentioned being acts of power by a body of men foreign to our constitution and unacknowledged by our laws, against which we do enter this our solemn protest. . . .

His majesty, for the most trifling reasons, and sometimes for no reason at all, has rejected laws of the most salutary tendency.

He has permitted our laws to lie neglected in England for years, neither confirming them by assent nor annulling them by his negativ.

He has, by his instructions, laid governors under such restrictions, they can pass no law without the suspension clause, so that no law can be enforced until it has twice crossed the Atlantic.

He has refused assent to a law for the division of a county of Virginia, unless the new county will consent to go unrepresented. As the boundary of the state is not fixed on the west, such new counties are hundreds of miles from their eastern limits.

He has dissolved the legislature of New York, an act that must ever require peculiar mention. One free and independent legislature hereby takes it on itself to dissolve another, free and independent as itself.

After dissolving one house, they hav refused to call another. . . . Thus dissolved, the power reverts to the people.

His majesty has lately taken on him to advance the terms of purchase of lands, by which means the population of our country is likely to be checked. . . .

He has from time to time sent among us large bodies of armed forces not made up of people here nor raised by our laws. . . . To render these proceedings still more criminal against our laws, instead of subjecting the military to the civil power, he has expressly made the civil subordinate to the military. . . .

These are the acts of power foreign to our constitutions and unacknowledged by our laws. [This section is long; refers to Boston riots, mock trials for murders, carrying witnesses and accused out of their vicinages for trial, says the cowards who would suffer a countryman to be torn from home for trial merit everlasting infamy. By the way, is it not as bad now in the United States, where we are dragged far off to United States courts?]

Our repeated attempts to prohibit the importation of slaves from Africa hav been defeated by his majesty's negativ, thus preferring the advantages of British corsairs to the interests of the states and rights of human nature deeply wounded by this infamous practice. . . . Our ancestors, before their immigration to America, were the free inhabitants of the British dominions. . . .

America was conquered and her settlements made and firmly established at the expense of individuals and not of the British public. Their own blood was spilt in acquiring lands for settlement; their own fortunes expended to make that settlement effectual. For themselvs they fought; for themselvs they conquered, and for themselvs alone they hav right to hold. . . . That settlement having been made, they thought proper to adopt that system of laws under which they had lived in the mother country and to continue the union with her under one common sovereign, who was thereby made the central link connecting the several parts of the empire. . . . Yet these states never supposed that by calling in her aid they thereby submitted to her sovereignty. [Such assistance she had given to Portugal and other allied states.]

These are our grievances thus laid before his majesty with that freedom of language which becomes a free people claiming their rights as derived from the laws of nature, and not as the gift of their chief magistrate. Let those flatter who fear; it is not an American art. To giv praise when it is not due would ill become those who are asserting the rights of human nature.

They know and will say kings are the servants, not masters, of the people. Open your breast, sire, to liberal and expanded thought. Let not the reign of George III. be a blot on the page of history. The whole art of government consists in the art of being honest. Do your duty and mankind will giv you credit where you fail. No longer persevere in sacrificing the rights of one part of the empire to the inordinate desires of another, but deal out impartial justice to all. This, sire, is the advice of your great American council. It is neither our interest nor our desire to separate from Great Britain. We are willing to sacrifice everything reason can ask to restore that tranquility all desire. Let them be ready to establish union on a generous plan. Let them name their terms, but let them be just. Let them not think to exclude us from going to other markets. . . Still less let it be proposed that our properties in our own territories shall be taxed by any power on earth but our own. The God who gave us life gave us liberty. The hand of force may destroy but can not disjoin them. This, sire, is our last, our determined, resolve.

Now, if anyone will take the original Declaration of Independence, and the foregoing, and the article entitled a "Summary," etc., referred to (in Vol. I Appendix C), and compare them, he will be assured that the author of the Declaration was the composer of the last. I mean the Declaration as it was offered to Congress, before it was abridged by that body.

The most striking resemblances are in the excluded parts. It is all in the style of Jefferson when he was highly animated. He was recognized as one of the best writers in that age of decidedly great English writers. The style of Paine differs much from that of Jefferson, being more condensed, and hot, and glowing. The Declaration was the full and perfect birth of that which had been carried in the thoughts of Jefferson for years. He was the very genius of our Revolution. Nor is there anything in the conduct of his whole life to justify the infamous charge that he repeatedly claimed to be the author of another's production. As to the authorship of Junius, if Paine is the man, I contend that expressions identically the same will be found in Junius and in "Common Sense," and "Rights of Man." A perfect disguise of style or a perfect counterfeit has never yet been made. Nor is it creditable to our founders that they should hav to owe their grand Declaration to a foreigner. But, fiat justitia. HOLT.

News and Notes.

An all-night ride amid a driving rain brought me in the early morn to the busy city of Omaha, and I almost thought I had struck the Arctic regions, such a chilling wind came sweeping over the Missouri. It was a grateful change, however, from the heated days through which I had just passed, wherein I was used to the "melting mood," and almost expected to be translated to heaven in a chariot of fire. The wintry blasts brought me to terra firma and a secular frame of mind and body. A good ice-box was just what I wanted. A refrigerator was preferable to a palace-car. This cold, lowering, and drizzling September morning was a refreshment. However, as the cars went speeding along the sun came shining brightly forth and all the fields were aglow, and when I arrived at West Point the noon-day radiance was almost unclouded, while cooling breezes fanned the cheek. It was a lovely day, and a lovely country spread about me, as if I were in the garden spot of the world. I was met at the station by my good friends A. A. Peterson, Ernest Wiese, and Otto Wichert, and driven to a comfortable hotel, where I felt as if I had got to a good resting-place after a nearly twenty-four hours' trip. West Point is in the midst of a prosperous country. It is to a large extent occupied by German settlers, most of whom are of the Liberal class. If I could hav spoken in the German language I should hav had crowded houses. However, the attendance at the three lectures, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings, was good. These were the first Freethought lectures in the English language ever given at this place. There hav been German Liberal speakers before. A Secular Union will undoubtedly be formed. The friends are enthusiastic. West Point, however, has seven churches to its population of two thousand, and so, of course, there must be plenty of hard work before the way is clear. Even if the churches hav not much life, they are dreadful stumbling-blocks in the path of improvement. Their very inertness is a power for evil. Doing nothing themselvs, they seem to exercise a fatal influence in the same direction over the community. A dead church is worse to deal with than a live church. Any kind of life is ultimately in favor of Liberalism. Mr. John D. Neligh, who introduced me at the lectures, is one of the oldest citizens of West Point, and has done more by the building of factories, etc., for the development of the place, than any other. He is a live man. He is prominently talked of for the governorship of the state, and he is worthy of that position. He is broad and generous in his aims and of superior executiv capacity. It will be a good political era when such really representativ men can be elected to office.

Mr. Anton Langer, Gustave Will, A. A. Peterson, Barney Von der Bergen, Otto Wickert, August Zenske, Ernest Wiese, H. Linert, Ferdinand Koch, H. V. Shaffer, with others, make a strong battalion of Freethinkers for this important point, and I believe that much effectiv work will be accomplished. This is one of the richest portions of the state. The farms are in excellent condition. The creamery makes over a thousand pounds of butter per day. I quite enjoyed my rides about the country, where the sturdy settlers, beginning with nothing almost, hav made such beautiful homes, where the abundance of harvest smiles amid the embowering trees. This is an Arcadian land.

The hot September sun shines when I strike Omaha, and Sunday, September 5th, was one of the most fiery days of the season. It had a tendency to make people indolent and stay at home. However, there was a very good attendance, afternoon and evening, at Boyd's Opera House. In the evening I gave my ideas about Mormonism, its religion, theology, etc., and the proper way to deal with this "eye-sore" of the republic. The present legislation is absurd and unjust, and unless a better way can be found out, the "let-alone" policy is about the best that can be adopted. This, however, is a confession of failure on the part of American democracy to meet the issue, and a giving over of one of our states to an absolutely oriental despotism, which will be the entering wedge for the disintegration of the republic. The Mormon question is of vast importance, for its solution requires the application of the profoundest principles of political philosophy.

I am now at the home of Thomas Foreman, who is one of our best workers. He used to be a Methodist, and that accounts, I guess, for his untiring devotion to our cause. He is the main spoke in the wheel here, and keeps it on the move. The Liberals are a bit of the laissez faire order. They don't care about doing much. If the world isn't all right, they themselvs are in a comfortable condition, and that is satisfactory to the average conscience. Omaha is such a rushing city, and everything is so on the boom in a business way, and material prosperity advances with such rapid strides, and the star of empire blazes so over every corner lot, the prices doubling in twenty-four hours, while even churches are on the go, and are not satisfied with anything less than a hundred-thousand-dollar building, that under such circumstances there is but little chance for the study of broad intellectual and social affairs. Still, the deeper elements are at work, and thought prevails. Mr. and Mrs. Foreman are those generous-minded and noble people whom it is a pleasure to meet with in our arduous labors. It gives us encouragement to endure all the disappointments of the way to know that the ideal world is not forgotten in the rush for the almighty dollar; that the truth is recognized as glorious, not because it gives food and clothing, but because it illuminates the whole way of man from age to age.

I also enjoyed the lively hospitality of Jas. Griffith, who believes in Freethought with all his mind and heart. He is radical to the backbone, and is always ready to do his share. He was formerly secretary of the society here, and was on hand every Sunday. Some years ago the activ campaign ceased at Omaha, but we hope for its vigorous prosecution hereafter. With a few such men as Griffith in the field, victory would not be long in coming.

I spent Monday afternoon with our stanch Scotch friend, Robert S. Colvin, who has sometimes given vigorous thought to the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He came to Omaha about seventeen years ago, and has been here ever since, and made a snug little home of his own in what was a comparativ wilderness when I was here twelve years ago, but which is now almost covered with buildings. It was a delight to break bread at this happy Secular fireside, and take the benefit of "this world," and, like the bee, improve the "shining moments," and make all the honey we can while "above ground," amid the sunshine and flowers.

The cool and golden evening came on, and with it another cheerful companion, C. C. Littlefield, in his carriage, behind a magnificent horse, inviting us to take a ride, and of course we accepted, for no Secular pilgrim will ever disdain the glorious horse, who more than any other animal makes life worth living. Every time I see a splendid horse I feel better. It gives me big faith in humanity to mount a gallant steed and rival the whirlwind's flight.

We went out to beautiful Fort Collins, the headquarters of the department of the Platte, and witnessed the handsome dress parade, while the sunset gun boomed and the band marched and sounded its martial strains. How the war visions swept over my mind as I looked upon the familiar picture of which I was once a part, keeping step to the music and following the resplendent colors! I was a dreamer then, with the knapsack on my back, and after the weariest march would fall asleep with thoughts of the "good time coming;" and I dream still. How I do envy the drum-major! What a picture of absolute content he is, with his gorgeous trappings, gold and crimson, and his enormous head-gear, that makes him look a giant among pigmies! What absolute, infinit delight he takes in himself! He has not the slightest doubt that he is the center of creation, and, as he twirls his glittering baton, his happiness is simply immense, perfectly continental, a divine intoxication. Would I were a drum-major! I don't believe anybody revels in the pure joy of existence as he does.

Littlefield took me over Omaha in the moonlight and the gaslight, and it is a wonderfully lively place. It is rushing right along to a population of one hundred thousand people. It claims over eighty thousand now. Over a million dollars' worth of buildings are in processs of construction, and every day some new enterprise is on foot. I stopped at Mr. Littlefield's dairy farm, which is prettily situated in the suburbs of the city. Like a good Liberal, he furnishes the best of milk, as I can attest, for I tried the refreshing draught, in rural fashion, from a tin cup.

So I leave Omaha with pleasant memories and happy anticipations. Something will be done and fraternity prevail. I had an agreeable visit also with Dr. Kaufman, who is an earnest and cultivated Liberal. I was pleased also to meet again Professor Huggins and J. E. Jurgenson, who was with me at Denver, and other friends whose cordial presence makes new hope in the gathering ranks of Free thought.

We are now speeding eastward. This evening and to-morrow evening I lecture at Cromwell, Iowa; Thursday and Friday evenings at Leon; Sunday next, Sept. 12th, at Ottumwa; Sept. 14th, 15th, 16th, at West Union, Iowa; Sept. 18th and 19th, at Chebanse, Ill.; Sept. 21st and 22d at Nekoma, Ill.; Sept. 26th at Chicago; Sept. 28th and 29th at Belding, Mich.; Oct. 1st, 2d, and 3d at West Union, Ohio.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

New York State Convention.

The Ninth Annual Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association began under rather unfavorable auspices, and continued under the same auspices to the end. It seems to be pretty well settled that Freethinkers do not want picnics, and that sociability, as Mr. Reynolds calls acquaintanceship and friendly intercourse, is held at a large discount —so large, in fact, that nothing remains. The Cassadaga Lake meeting was voted a failure, and the White Sulphur Springs Convention was no greater success as regards attendance. In another way, however, the Convention was an immense success. There never was a merrier party than the dozen or so who wrote their names in Mr. Luther's register on the first or second days. Even the transparent fact that the annual gathering of Freethinkers was not a gathering at all did not dampen the enthusiasm of the old guard, nor make their wit less keen nor their laughter less hearty. It was voted every day with great unanimity that the absent members of the great Freethought family were missing several valuable years of existence. Among those who voted affirmativly on this question were the following: S. W. Devenbaugh, of Brimfield, Ind.; William Thorpe and family, of Ballston Spa, N. Y.; C. P. Somerby, of New York; Mrs. Gault, of Kalamazoo, Mich.; Mrs. C. B. Reynolds, of North Parma, N. Y.; L. K. Washburn, of Boston, Mass.; Charles Booth and wife, of Boonton, N. J.; J. J. McCabe, of Albany, N. Y.; C. M. Powers, of Springfield, Mass.; C. B. Reynolds, of North Parma, N. Y.; Alexander McAlpin, of Newark, N. J.; C. F. DeMott and wife, of Hempstead, L. I.; John Peck, of Naples, N. Y.; Lucy Colman, of Syracuse, N. Y.; Josephine Tilton, of Boston, Mass.; E. Chantler, of Welland, Ont.; F. A. Mollineaux, of Merrick, L. I.; J. L Andrew, of Kansas; Robert Wade, of Troy, N. Y.; S. N. Gardner and wife, of Troy, N. Y.; William Hawenstein, of New York; Gopal Vinayak Joshee, of Roselle, N. J.; Helen Gardener, of New York; Miss Frances Lord, of London, Eng.; Ida L. LeCompte, of New York; Marie C. Burnier, of New York; T. B. Wakeman, of New York; T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, N. Y.; E. B. Foote, Sen., of New York; Mr. G. G. Grower, of Ansonia, Conn.; Mary Tillotson, of Vineland, N. J.; William Wilcox, Warrensburgh, N. Y., and Henry Evans, of Lowville, N. Y.

C. B. Reynolds, as major domo and general director, was busy as a bee on the grounds several days before the beginning, engaged in advertising the meetings and erecting the large tent in which they were held. The first person to join him was the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who shortly wished he had been less precipitate in following the meandering railway path that leads from Troy to the White Sulphur Springs. He was promptly put to work driving stakes for the tent, making seats out of huge planks, and building the platform from which the speakers were to enlighten such of the Saratoga county heathen as could be lured into the pavilion. Up to the Monday night following the Convention consisted of the two individuals named and Mr. L. K. Washburn, the Investigator lecturer; C. P. Somerby, Mr. and Mrs. Booth, of Boonton; Mr. Devenbaugh, of Indiana; Mrs. Tillotson, of New Jersey; Mr. Grower, of Connecticut; Mr. Powers, Mrs. E. H. Gault, Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, J. J. McCabe, of Albany, and Frank Burnier, a TRUTH SEEKER clerk on his vacation. The speakers were Mr. Washburn, Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds, and J. J. McCabe. The audience at all the sessions except Sunday consisted of the above named people, reinforced by the hotel employees, a few sinners from Saratoga, and a woman who had once belonged to the Salvation Army, and whose husband would not giv her money to go and hear the Freethinkers. She had a front seat at every lecture. Sunday the population from the surrounding country came in, to the number of three or four hundred, and the grounds presented less the appearance of a desert with a tent in the middle and hotel in the background.

Friday evening Mr. Reynolds addressed the center-pole of the tent in an enthusiastic manner; Saturday afternoon about thirty people heard Mr. Washburn; Saturday evening some twenty gathered to hear Mr. Reynolds. But on Sunday morning Mr. McCabe had a good audience; Sunday afternoon Mr. Washburn drew the largest concourse of the whole ten days, and in the evening Mrs. Reynolds spoke to some two hundred people in the tent and about a hundred outside for an hour. A prominent feature of this Convention in a tent was the facility it afforded for the heathen to cheat the Association out of the door fee. At every session at least half as many pressed their ears to the exterior of the canvas walls as sat within. They obtained the gospel of humanity free and without price, except such payment as tired legs enforced.

The mornings of the Convention days were passed in recreativ enjoyments. The outside world could not penetrate the little wilderness until noon, and therefore no lectures were held till 3:30 P.M. White Sulphur Springs is a beautifully situated park of about one hundred acres, consisting of woods and fields, picnic groves and rambling roads; the whole bordering on Saratoga Lake, a sheet of water eight miles long by from two to four wide. Over these hills, through these woods, and across this lake the New York State Freethinkers' Association diffused itself early in the morning. There were enough of them to fill a good many nooks, and from every corner came sounds of conversation and laughter. Across the lake livs J. V. Arnold, a wealthy Freethinking farmer with a large melon patch, which was the objectiv point of boat-load after boat-load of people who agreed with Mr. Arnold in his speculativ opinions and in his estimate of watermelons and cantelopes. Mr. Arnold ought to be glad that the Convention is over, for his own generosity and the patience of his wife were sorely taxed in entertaining Freethinkers who talked theology with one eye over the garden fence. The people who missed attending this Convention—and Mr. Arnold's melon congress—will always hav cause to regret their inaction. With a forenoon spent in fun and jollity, the Convention was always ready for serious business in the afternoon. And it was serious business for the speakers. Two-thirds of the average audience were speakers themselvs, and he who can instruct such men and women as Lucy Colman, L. K. Washburn, T. L. Brown, Judge Brewer, Helen Gardener, John Peck, and others of brilliant attainments must needs be wise indeed. C. B. Reynolds began the work of the last week by speaking on Monday evening upon "Bible Ghostology." Tuesday afternoon the Convention met in the picnic ground to listen to Mr. Reynolds, Mrs. Colman, Judge Brewer, and Mr. Peck. In the evening Mr. Peck put "The Gods on Exhibition," and the show was worth traveling several hundred miles to see. Wednesday, Mr. DeMott, of Hempstead, and Mrs. Colman, were the platform attractions—the first lecturing upon astronomy, the second giving her reminiscences as a reformer. Thursday afternoon J. L. Andrew, of Kansas, gave his definition of "True Liberty," and in the evening Mr. L. K. Washburn told how "Christian Morality" is decaying. Friday was devoted to short talks upon all sorts of subjects. Saturday afternoon Mr. Andrew described "Modern Infidelity," and in the evening Gopal Vinayak Joshee told us about "Socialism in India."

Saturday forenoon the business meeting of the Convention was held. The secretary, Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, read a report of the proceedings of the convention at Albany last year. This report was substantially as given in THE TRUTH SEEKER at the time. The treasurer, E. M. Macdonald, submitted the following summary of his stewardship:

EXPENSES OF ALBANY CONVENTION.		RECEIPTS.
Preliminary expenses of Ch. Ex. Com.	$60.58	Advanced by Ch. Ex. Com.	$13.73
Debts incurred at Cassadaga	149.30	Donations	230.00
Advertising and Printing	296.83	Sale of Convention tickets	279.55
Lecturers	229.00	Sale of tickets to R. G. Ingersoll's lecture	736.50
Expenses of lecturers	125.75
Hall rent	45.00
Music	60.00
Incidentals	40.48
Divided by R. G. Ingersoll's direction between C. Watts and S. P. Putnam	252.84
	$1,259.78		$1,259.78

The two reports were adopted. C. B. Reynolds then offered the following amendment to the constitution of the Association:

OFFICERS: The officers of this Association shall be a president, one vice-president for each county in the state, a secretary, and a treasurer. The duties of the officers shall be those usually pertaining to these positions.

EXECUTIV COMMITTEE: There shall be elected annually an executiv committee consisting of a chairman of the executiv committee and two other members, who shall hav the general supervision of the Association. The president of the Association shall act as president of the executiv committee, and the secretary of the Association as the secretary of the executiv committee.

After considerable discussion, these amendments were unanimously adopted. The following additional amendments were also adopted, being the general expression of several members of the association:

That the executiv committee shall at their discretion appoint a vice-president for each county in the state, and such vice-president so appointed shall, within twenty days from the date of appointment, send to the secretary of the association letter of acceptance and the names and post-office addresses of two persons, residents of the county, to act as associates. The three persons thus chosen shall constitute the county committee. It shall be the duty of each county committee, under the advice of the executiv committee, to procure and superintend the distribution of leaflets and other Liberal literature within their county, use every endeavor to obtain subscribers to Liberal papers, and aid and encourage the formation of local Secular societies, with science schools on Sundays, in every school district in their county, and in all and every practicable way work to secure the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

That in case any person appointed by the executiv committee to act as vice-president shall fail to notify the secretary of acceptance, and the names of associates, or when no suitable person can be found or decided on for the position of vice-president, the executiv committee shall at its discretion appoint and send capable person or persons into such county to build up, interest, and organize local Secular societies within such county.

The new executiv committee were also instructed to incorporate the Association, and to prosecute before the legislature the work begun last year for the repeal of the laws exempting church property from taxation. The following motions were also unanimously adopted:

That the business part of the next Convention shall consist of delegates from local Secular societies, and members of the Association. That none but those holding certificate of membership, showing dues paid for the year, shall be admitted to or participate in any business meeting of the Association. That the annual dues of membership shall be twenty-five cents, payable yearly in advance, and that on receipt of the name, post-office address, and the sum of twenty-five cents, the secretary shall send a certificate of membership signed by the president and secretary of the association. That the executiv committee be and is hereby requested to prepare and instruct the secretary to send to every Liberal in the state an appeal for a donation of one dollar, to create a fund to carry on the work of the association; and that every person contributing one dollar or more shall be entitled to certificate of membership for the year. That the secretary be and is hercby instructed to write and obtain from H. L. Green, of Salamanca, the list of members of the association while he was secretary, and also all books of account, minute books, and all documents and papers now in his possession belonging to the association.

The resolutions passed at the convention of 1885 were unanimously reaffirmed. These resolutions will be found in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 19th of last year. The following officers were then elected:

President: T. B. Wakeman, New York.
Secretary: Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, North Parma, N. Y.
Treasurer: E. M. Macdonald, New York.
Executiv Committee: C. B. Reynolds, chairman, North Parma, N. Y.; C. F. DeMott, Hempstead, Long Island, N. Y.; Helen H. Gardener, New York.

Sunday the 12th was expected to be a big day, and preparations were made to preach the gospel of humanity to a large multitude. But the morning broke cold and cloudy, promising rain, and the multude did not arrive. At 10:30, Dr. T. L. Brown, for seven years president of the Association, spoke upon "What We Know and Do." In the afternoon Mrs. Reynolds gave a "Woman's Reason for the Gospel of Humanity," and Helen H. Gardener delivered her new lecture upon "The Pulpit, the Pew, and the Cradle." In the evening T. B. Wakeman instructed those present upon "Earthquakes as a Factor in Constructiv Liberalism." Previous to the lecture the following resolution was passed:

Resolved, That the Freethinkers' Association now assembled remember with sadness that our friend, the good and true Elizur Wright, has crossed the river of death and his bodily presence is gone from our sight forever; but our sorrow is relieved by the remembrance that he was in an especial manner an honor to the cause of liberty and humanity, and his memory is a perpetual benediction.

At the conclusion of Mr. Wakeman's discourse, the Convention adjourned subject to the call of the executiv committee.

Such, in brief, was the work of the Ninth Annual Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association. So far as numbers go, the Convention was a disappointment. But the absent members are the only ones to be commiserated. Those who were present are to be congratulated. They nobly fulfilled the main purpose of the gathering, which was to become acquainted, and to organize or to perfect plans for an organization which will enable the association to become something more than an annual mass meeting. If the executiv committee shall fulfil its duties, and hav the support of the Liberals of the state, next year ought to see at least one hundred activ local societies and Sunday-schools formed between New York and Buffalo. As the greatest results achieved by the National Liberal League at any time in its history were the product of the smallest congress it ever held, so, let us hope, will the last Convention of the state organization produce a better year of work than any that has preceded it. The fortunate few who were there were not in the least discouraged, but rather stimulated to more heroic endeavors.

Of the speaking and speakers it is almost superfluous to write. All but three of the orators are well known to the eastern Liberal public. Mrs. Reynolds, however, has but recently entered upon platform work, and the pity is that she had not sooner found her true vocation. L. K. Washburn, too, was a revelation to New Yorkers, and, like Mrs. Reynolds, captured the affections of every one of his listeners. Educated for the Unitarian ministry, he became a heretic before his ordination, and refused at that ceremony to hav sacerdotal hands laid upon his head. When occupying a pulpit he selected texts from Emerson instead of from the Bible, and taught his congregation ethics instead of theology. He has formed large congregations of substantial Infidels at Revere, Harwich, and Lynn, Mass., and at Minneapolis, Minn. For the past five years he has been engaged in business, emerging only occasionally to occupy the Paine-Hall platform. The readers of the Investigator know him from his published speeches. Mr. Mendum has engaged him to lecture for the coming season, and he ought to hav a platform every evening. His lectures are among the most scholarly productions of the Freethought speakers. He has the graces and gifts of the orator, and withal carries around an exceedingly level head. There is no speaker in the field at present who is his superior, except Colonel Ingersoll, and that gentleman is not personally more loved than Mr. Washburn by those who know him. Mr. J. L. Andrew and Mr. C. F. DeMott are the only other speakers with whom our readers are not acquainted. Mr. Andrew was suffering from a bad cold and scarcely did himself justice. He is a solid, logical, platform worker, used to hard labor and delighting in it. While in the East he desires engagements, and may be addressed for the next three weeks in care of this office. Mr. DeMott is a young man, who does more than he says. He possesses the quiet courage that insures success, and his efforts in behalf of Liberalism at his home are a record of glory. An outline of most of the speeches appeared in the Herald, and we shall publish in full such of them as were written out.

While not ending in a blaze of glory, as did the Convention last year at Albany, we think this meeting will be fully as fruitful as that one. People with sufficient enthusiasm to attend a convention are usually self-sacrificing enough to continue the work when they reach home. At this Convention they became aquainted, and a unity of purpose now binds them together. For the first time the State Association assumes an aggressiv form, with the distinct purpose of supplanting the churches by local societies so far as may be done. We hope the executiv committee will receive the support of the Liberals of the state financially, and by forming local associations wherever there are two or three people who may gather together in the name of Liberalism. The executiv committee is preparing directions for forming these associations, and literature for distribution, and as soon as completed they may be obtained of the secretary, Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, North Parma, N. Y.

MR. HENRY APPLETON, of Boston, will cease his editorial labors on Liberty. He and Mr. Tucker are unable to agree on the question whether the state itself should be abolished, or the spirit of authority which breeds the state. Mr. Tucker goes at the state; Mr. Appleton at authority per se. Though no longer an editorial writer, Mr. Appleton will probably continue his contributions to Liberty.

THOMAS F. PLUNKETT, of Hartford, Conn., president of the Hartford Silk Company, and treasurer of the Manchester Union Manufacturing Company, has left for parts unknown, taking $250,000 with him. The Philadelphia Inquirer alludes to Mr. Plunkett as a "fiduciary infidel," but that must not be construed as reflecting on his orthodoxy. What the Inquirer meant to say was that he had been unfaithful to his trust. There is nothing about Mr. Plunkett's conduct to indicate that he is religiously unsound.

THE Salvation Army invaded Winsted, Conn., recently, heralded by circulars announcing that "Captain Gilleo, for the Glory of God and the Salvation of Souls, would preach ten minutes, standing on his head." A crowd of young men attended the meeting to see the salvationist stand on his head if he would, and with an understanding among themselvs that they would "stand him on his head" if he failed to fulfil the promis of his circulars. He did not stand on his head, nor did they undertake to make him do so, three policemen being on hand to prevent any attempt to compel so peculiar an act of devotion. The editor of the Press remarks that when a man advertises to stand on his head for the glory of God he should keep his word or refund the gate money.

"The Mystery of Matter."

Under the above title Mr. Fitzgerald has published an essay by J. Allanson Pincton, in the last number of the Humboldt Popular Science Library. The author joins issue with the Materialistic conclusions of the majority of scientists, and undertakes to prove that their philosophy fails to account for the phenomena of feeling and consciousness. This essay is followed in the same number of the library by another from the same author entitled, "The Philosophy of Ignorance," in which the author advances the idea that matter and spirit are equally phenomenal manifestations of one unknown substance.

It is to be expected that the acceptance of the theory of evolution should giv a new impetus to the effort to solve the problem of the true nature of matter and spirit, and that entirely new arguments should be brought forward, pro and con, and that many new conclusions should be reached.

The old belief that God—spirit—has created the universe—matter—out of nothing being overthrown, matter, ever-present in all known phenomena, seems to be the controling force, while spirit, only manifested in conjunction with matter, seems to be compelled to take a subordinate place. But if the logic of evolution undoubtedly points to the supremacy of matter, there are sensations and feelings inherent in ourselvs which prevent many thinkers from accepting this position, and the belief in the supremacy of spirit finds many supporters among persons of sufficient ability to command respect for any opinions they may entertain. It is true that their belief does not rest, so far, upon a logical process of investigation, but upon an inward feeling which prevents them from accepting the ultimate conclusions reached by following the Materialistic arguments.

It is on that account that these essays hav special value, for if Mr. Pincton is not very successful in establishing his new theory that spirit and matter are equally phenomenal manifestations of some unknown substance, he is a very competent critic, and points out many fallacies in the theory of the supremacy of matter.

His first objection is one hard to overthrow. It is the impossibility to establish the chain of communication between the material phenomena and their effects upon feeling and consciousness. It is possible, and has been done, to follow an impression, as conveyed by a distant object, by means of waves of light, to our eyes, and by the optic nerves to our brain, but once there we lose track of it, and the most learned physicist cannot tell how this impression affects our consciousness, or why our consciousness should be affected by it. At the end of the mechanical process we reach the domain of feelings and consciousness, a domain so widely separated from the domain of molecular mechanics that no bridge has ever been built to span the space between them; and it is this wide space between the two, the immeasurably great distance which exists between the cause—molecular changes—and the effect—sensation and consciousness—which prevents many scientists from accepting in full the Materialist theory.

Mr. Pincton shows also that, plausible as is the atomic theory, it fails to account for the expansion and the contraction of matter. After a very interesting and clear dissertation upon matter, and arriving at the conclusion that "the one essential property of matter is its exclusiv occupation of space," he says: "The more favored doctrin of modern times teaches that matter is ultimately constituted of minute indivisible particles, which are separated one from another by spaces immeasurably small, yet definit and real. The attraction and repulsion of these atoms between themselvs is supposed to explain the phenomena of chemical combination Their agitation in their narrow orbits constitutes heat, the repulsion occasioned by this agitation explains expansion, and the same agitation, if sufficiently intense, may be communicated to the ether, thus creating light. There is, of course, very much to be said for such a theory, but when molecular chemistry undertakes to say what those centers are, and assures me that they are hard little kernels of a substance fundamentally different from and incommensurable with the life which is the only mode of being which I certainly and directly know, then I must beg leave to demur. I might do so on the ground that the physical philosopher is here asserting what he cannot possibly know—precisely the crime which he is always imputing to theologians—but I go further, and I say that he is asserting what is absurd, unthinkable, impossible. For in the spaces between these ultimate atoms there exists either some matter supposed to be more subtle than the atoms, or absolutely no matter at all. If the former alternativ be taken, this is simply the continuity of matter over again. Every point of space is occupied by its own point of matter, which positivly excludes any other from occupying the same space. The atmosphere in the interspaces, therefore, must be equally dense with the atoms which they surround, and the distinction between them disappears. But if there is absolutely no matter between the atoms, then all their effects one upon another must be exerted across a void—that is, through a medium of nothingness; or, in other words, the presence of force does not necessarily imply the presence of matter, and the only reason for assuming the latter as something different from force is given up. The size of the interval makes no difference at all in the argument. Whether that interval is the ninety-two-billionth of an inch or the ninety-two million miles, or thereabouts, between the earth and the sun, if force can pass through—that is, can exist in—a space absolutely void of all matter, then the inseparability of matter and force is altogether given up. Yet the only reason for our belief in any matter different in substance from the subtle essence of our consciousness is an inference from the presence of force, and from its apparent distribution at definit centers. Force, it is argued, must be exerted by something and must act upon something. Very true; but if you infer from this that the presence of force implies always the presence of a sustaining material substance, the one essential quality of which is the exclusiv occupation of space, then I say your own atomic theory contradicts you. I put before you the conception of two atoms, and I draw round each of them a circle. These circles touch at the middle point between the two, and I ask you, what exists there? On the theory, you are bound to reply, nothing but force. If the atoms repel each other, their contrary forces meet here and struggle here. If the atoms attract each other, the attractiv force of each meets here and lays hold of that of the other here. Now, if force can exist here at the tangential point of the two circles, without any matter at all in which it inheres, why is not the same thing possible at the centers as well?"

The reading of these essays, and especially the line of arguments used to show that the atomic theory fails to account for the transmission of force, has led me to attempt to express some ideas of my own on these problems, ideas which are the result of some observations upon the phenomena of conduct, and its relation to feeling and consciousness. I will not express any opinion upon Mr. Pincton's theory that matter and spirit are equally phenomenal manifestations of one unknown substance. He may be correct, for he advances some strong arguments to show that any other proposition cannot be maintained. These essential propositions as he states them are:

1. We may regard matter and spirit as two separate and distinct substances, capable of mutual relations, but entirely incommensurable. This is the popular view—tolerable only so long as the word substance is loosely understood.
2. We may suppose spirit to be a generalization of certain phenomena of matter.
3. We may treat of matter as a phenomenon of spirit.
4. We may insist that matter and spirit are equally phenomenal manifestations of one unknown substance.

This last proposition is the only one he accepts as correct, but it seems to be difficult to prove, and if proven throws but little light on the mystery of matter.

Leaving aside the question of the origin of spirit and matter, the fact remains that they are separately manifested by two classes of phenomena entirely distinct and separate from each other, and it is in relation to the part or function which each plays in the perpetual changes which contribute to progress that I hold some opinions somewhat different from those usually received.

Matter I hold to be composed of atoms, according to the atomic theory. I see no reason to reject the scientific definition of atoms that they are infinitesimal kernels of substance; but to these atoms I do not concede any force, motion, heat, sensation, or knowledge, nor the possibility of acquiring any. They are simply the material used by the spirit—so called—to make the different combinations which make up the universe as we know it.

This inert matter, incapable by itself of any progress or changes, is controled by another agent which, on account of the many variations of its manifestations, is known to us by many different names. This agent is alone capable of motion, of force, of heat, of sensation, of knowledge and intelligence. In its higher manifestations it is known to us by the name of spirit, mind, soul, intelligence. It is this agent which controls and directs all phenomena, but it can only perform its work in connection with and by the coöperation of matter, and thus is not recognized by us except in material phenomena.

What is this agent? Scientists tell us that the greater or lesser attraction of atoms for each other is due to something they call electricity; and some agent which is called living force, nervous force, vital force, vital electricity, controls living growth and living actions, and under the name of magnetism is found to control many phenomena which otherwise could not be explained, and the proof seems to be getting stronger every day that this comparativly newly recognized force, electricity, is the basis of all the life, motion, and changes which take place in the universe.

This is the conclusion to which I hav slowly been led, and I will support it by a few of the arguments which hav induced me to accept this opinion.

First, let us take the simple phenomenon of the expansion of iron by heat. If we accept the atomic theory, we cannot account for the expansion by the atoms enlarging themselvs. Another substance, stronger than they are, must be injected in the spaces, and thus drive the atoms apart. If scientists are right, and electricity is the substance which holds them together, then nothing but an increase of electricity will account for the expansion, and it is easy enough to understand how it is done by heat, if heat is one of the forms by which electricity manifests itself. But if it is electricity which either draws closer or drives farther apart the atoms which constitute the iron, then it is electricity which is the controling force, and although we may not be able to see it or feel it, and the atoms may be the most perceptible to our senses, yet it is not the iron which contains the electricity, as we now express it, but the electricity which contains the iron; and as this must be true of all substances, our mode of expression, and mode of thought, and our conclusions in regard to the true function of matter, must be as erroneous as were the expressions, thoughts, and conclusions in regard to the movements of the earth around the sun.

The same mistake is made in regard to living organisms, and it was the study of human conduct and human actions which has led me to surrender the extreme Materialistic belief, and adopt the modified theory I now hold, for neither the Materialist nor the Spiritualist is able to explain the different phenomena of human action. No theory of mechanical vibration can account for the faculty of memory and for its cumulativ result in intelligence, nor for the translation of perceptions into feelings and actions. Nor is the Spiritualist idea of the unlimited control of spirit over matter, of the spontaneity of its knowledge, of its infallibility, of its power of free will and of free desire, any easier of acceptance, for it is disproved every day by a close study of the phenomena of human action. These phenomena can only be accounted for, with our present advanced knowledge, by the presence of some agent capable of acquiring and storing knowledge, of realizing the difference between pleasant and unpleasant sensations, and of using its knowledge and sensations in controling matter in any desired direction. This agent I find in vital force. Grant to electricity the faculty of registering past experiences, and of making use of them for future action; grant also to it the faculty of realizing its own knowledge, that is, the power of feeling which ultimates into self-consciousness, and we can follow the evolution of knowledge and of feeling step by step with the evolution of matter from the most simple form of combination in the gaseous or nebulous stage to the actual period of the most complex organisms.

This theory furnishes us with a plausible explanation of phenomena which cannot be explained under any other supposition, and it does away with Mr. Pincton's objection of the lack of continuity between material phenomena and their effect upon consciousness. According to its teachings, there are no purely material phenomena. The waves of light and the nerves are the material which furnishes the means of communication to the agent which itself feels and is conscious. It explains the phenomena of heredity. It is the vital force present in the germ which seizes upon matter and with it builds the living organism, and it is the unconscious memory of the past experience of its ancestors which enables it to control and direct its own conduct.

There are many other problems which hav puzzled the human mind, and to which accepted beliefs furnish no answer. One very interesting is the origin of life. In denying the existence of a being able to create, we hav no means of accounting for the sudden appearance of life here. According to my theory, life is one of the forms under which this electric force manifests itself, and it permeates the whole universe, and what we call living organisms are simply a form of combination more complex, and the difference between living organisms and inert matter is one of degree and not of kind.

Nor hav we, at this time, any plausible explanation of the presence of intelligence in the universe; and yet it seems to me very clear that, just as life permeates everything, so do knowledge and intelligence exist all around us. How shall we account for it? We can no longer ascribe it to the will of God who gave to each organism knowledge and wisdom according to its wants. And yet knowledge, both activ and latent, not only exists, but is found to control all phenomena. The germ of each living plant, for example, contains sufficient latent knowledge to control its growth in a special direction, but that knowledge may remain dormant for ages until brought out by the right environment, when it will assert itself, and so direct the growth that the best result will be attained possible in the actual conditions. How do scientists now account for this? When a man breaks one of his limbs and the bones begin to knit together and the wound to heal, they tell us that it is due to a wise provision of nature, which accomplishes what the intelligence of man could not do. But they do not tell us what they mean by the word "nature," nor who gave it the necessary knowledge, nor what are the limits of its intelligence. Nor can they tell us if nature is a conscious or unconscious force. Yet those questions are inseparable from the question of the true relation of matter and spirit. The knowledge and intelligence exist. No one can deny it. Are they the attributes of matter or the attributes of spirit? Is the knowledge in the broken limb, or outside of it?

My theory of the ability of electricity to acquire and store knowledge accounts for its presence all through matter; for its latent condition, and for its proper specialization; and what is called the wisdom of nature is, I believe, the result of past experiences transmitted to the organism through heredity.

I hold that at the time this earth was in a nebulous state there was in it the potency for all the life, motion, intelligence, feeling, consciousness, that there is in it now, but the power was activ in another form and manifested itself in a different manner. As the earth cooled, the heat, instead of being radiated in space—a belief incompatible with the theory of the conservation of energy—was transformed into life, knowledge, and consciousness; and new combinations, adapted to the manifestation of these faculties, replaced the combinations of the heated period. Through heredity these combinations became specialized, each line experimenting in a special direction, and transmitting its acquired knowledge to its successors. Thus vegetables acquired the knowledge needed for vegetable life; fishes, the knowledge that fitted them to liv in the water; and animals and man hav progressed so far as to reach the high stage of development of the present time. Thus an immense amount of knowledge has been developed and is stored away for use, but it is all specialized knowledge, each organism possessing just that kind it needs and no other; and all this knowledge is not a spontaneous creation, nor the gift of a superior and omnipotent spirit, but the result of hard-bought experience tested by the ordeal of the survival of the fittest.

While this hypothesis may seem fanciful to many, and to rest on a very slender foundation, it will alone, so far as I can judge, account for the phenomena by which we are surrounded.

If we admit a difference in kind—not degree—between living and dead, motion and rest, knowledge and ignorance, heat and cold, we fall into a dilemma from which there is no escape; if we attribute to matter heat and motion, and to spirit feeling and intelligence, we fail to follow the chain which unites these different phenomena, and are stopped on every hand by gaps which we can neither bridge over nor cross. But with this theory we meet no such difficulty. Electricity becomes the base of all spiritual phenomena, as atoms are the base of all matter, and ever united the chain can be followed from the single phenomenon of the attraction and repulsion of atoms in their narrow orbits to the complex phenomena of intelligent action; and the blind force of gravitation is found to develop into sensation and feeling till it emerges in self-consciousness, and electricity, under the form of magnetism, is found to rule the loves as well as the hates of man and woman.

And now, before I conclude, I want to quote here some opinions expressed by men well known by their mark in the field of scientific researches, and bearing upon the subject under investigation. Speaking of the influence of the sun's rays upon life, Grant Allen, in his work upon Charles Darwin, says: "Here biology next steps in with its splendid explanation of organic life, as due essentially to the secondary action of radiated solar energy on the outer crust of such a cooling and evolving planet. Falling on the cells of the simplest green plants, the potent sunlight dissociates the carbonic acid floating in the atmosphere, and builds it up with the hydrogen of water in the tissues of the organism into starch and other organic products, which differ from the inert substances around them mainly by the possession of locked-up solar energy. On the energy-yielding food-stuffs thus stored up the animal in turn feeds and fattens, reducing what was before potential into actual motion, just as the steam-engin reduces the latent solar energy of coal into visible heat and visible movement in its furnance and in its machinery."

How this influence of the sun is exerted is not yet well known, but it is somewhat remarkable that in a series of observations to ascertain the relation of the periodical appearance of the sun's spots upon earthly phenomena, no influence could be recognized except in regard to the variations of the magnetic needle, where a perfect coincidence was found to exist, thus establishing a clear connection between the sun's rays and magnetic influences, as well as between the sun's rays and organic life.

In his work on "The Atomic Theory," A. D. Wurtz says:

> We will, however, consider more closely the hypothesis of the discontinuity of matter, which would be formed of molecules and atoms in motion, in a medium which fills the activ universe and permeates all bodies—the ether.
> Atoms are not material points; they possess a sensible dimension, and doubtless a fixed form; they differ in their relativ weight and in the motions with which they are animated. They are indestructible and indivisible by chemical and physical forces, for which they are in some manner as points of application.

This expression, "for which they are in the same manner as points of application," means exactly what I hav tried to express, that atoms are the substance acted upon by electricity, but I differ in denying to them the power of heat, motion, etc., which is generally attributed to them, as is shown by the following quotation from the same author upon the nature of ether:

> Ether is not a vacuum; it is a medium formed of a highly rarefied and elastic matter, agitated by perpetual vibrations, which are transmitted from atomic matter to the ether, and from the ether to atomic matter. Is it a homogeneous, continuous medium? Is it formed of atoms of a second order, a kind of monads which would form by their aggregation ponderable matter itself? This is a question which can be brought forward, but which cannot be solved. Poisson inclined toward the hypothesis of the discontinuity of the ether; it seemed to him difficult to admit that luminous vibrations could be propagated transversely in a continuous medium. Such as it is, this imperceptible and imponderable medium has, nevertheless, a density, and, after a revived hypothesis of Lesage—that of transmundane atoms—it is the influence of this fluid which would cause the stars of the visible world to gravitate toward each other.

This hypothesis of an ether, filling up all space, imperceptible and imponderable, is brought forward not as the result of physical experiments, but because it can alone explain phenomena otherwise incapable of explanation, and is a step toward the acknowledgment that this medium alone possesses heat, motion, feeling, and intelligence. I find another step in the same direction in an essay from a noted physician, Dr. Richardson, entitled, "A Theory of Nervous Ether." Among other things, he says:

> It occurs to my mind, however, that the veritable fluid of nervous matter is not of itself sufficient to act as the subtle medium that connects the outer with the inner universe of man and animals. I think—and this is the modification I suggest to the older theory—there must be another form of matter present during life, a matter which exists in the condition of vapor or gas, which pervades the whole nervous organism, surrounds, as an enveloping atmosphere, each molecule of nervous structure, and is the medium of all motion communicated to or from the nervous centers.
> When it is once fairly presented to the mind that during life there is in the animal body a finely diffused form of vapor, a vapor filling every part, and even stored in some parts, a matter constantly renewed by the vital chemistry, a matter as easily disposed of as the breath after it has served its purpose, a new flood of light breaks in on the intelligence. Our own consciousness reëchoes to the fact. Our experience assures us that between ourselvs and the outer world there is, while we liv, an intercommunicating bond which connects us with the outer world, which is apart from the gross visible substances we call flesh, bone, brain, blood; which in some way nevertheless is connected with both heart and brain and organs of sense; which is made in and within our organism; which, produced in over quantities, oppresses us; which, produced in too small quantities, is insufficient for our wants; which is renewed by food and sleep, exhausted by wakefulness and labor; which receives every vibration from without, and lets the same vibrate within us, to be fixed or reflected back, and which conveys the impulse when we will an act and perform it.

These are only some of the statements which I hav found, in the last few years, expressed with much caution by scientists, but all leading in the same direction. The question of the true nature of these feelings we call personality, consciousness, of the basis of instinct and intelligence, of the true scope and function of the living principle, are attracting more and more attention, and in the light of the theory of evolution, which compels the investigator to establish a complete chain between the dead, unfeeling, ignorant matter of the early ages, and the living, conscious, intelligent man of to-day, the old explanations are discarded, and new hypotheses tentativly tried.

The subject is not one of purely speculativ value. It holds the key to the problem of future life; of the probability of so-called spirit manifestations; of the overthrow of disease and the increase of life; and a true solution will alone furnish a scientific basis for the improvement of the social relations, for the knowledge of the true relation of matter and spirit can alone giv us a knowledge of the true position of man here.

Colonel Ingersoll's Theory About Music.

Colonel Ingersoll thinks that great progress has been made in music in this country, and declares that Americans are coming to an era in music which appeals to the intellect. In talking about the drama, he declared his admiration for men of intellect to lead him, first of all, to pay homage to Shakspere, whom he regards as the most wonderful delineator of human passions the world has ever known. Speaking of music, he said: "The first form of music is that which appeals to the heels. It is merely regularity of sound. As it is lower or higher in tone or quicker or faster in movement it is rhythm, and appeals to the senses in a greater or less degree. Then there is music of association. Persons learn to associate a national air with their feelings of patriotism. A man may like a tune because his mother sang it, or because he heard it in the old home days. But there is a higher music than all this, which appeals to the great intellectual force in men, by which they are led to forget themselvs and all the surroundings, and are carried away to realms of thought from which they would be glad never to return. This is the highest music of all, and is the music in which this country is making progress more rapidly than any other country on the face of the globe."—Tribune.

Mixed Pickles.

Talmage and Sam Jones are working the salvation racket for all it is worth, apparently, but they go about it in different ways. The Brooklyn fixed star does not obtrude hell to a frightful extent, but dwells mostly on the joys of hevaen. While he doesn't specify many of said joys, he describes heaven as being a place of far more transcendent splendor than John Hoey's park at Elberon, or "Paradise Park" in this city, and says all the "saved" will prance around there on white horses, and carry golden harps. Heaven has twelve gates of pearl, he says, and all the roads, which are paved with gold—how Squire would like to be superintendent of public works there!—lead to the throne of Jehovah; and immortal life there will be one of ecstatic bliss from start to finish—stop, there is no finish; from start to—to —well, to forever more and moreover, say. Thus Talmage is trying to secure recruits for heaven with promises of a life of unalloyed bliss, suns toothache, sans taxes, and things that render earthly life hardly worth the living.

Jones, the wandering aërolite, dwells not so much on heaven as on hell, which he trots out in all its red horridity, thinking, no doubt, that heaven is too good for sinful mortals. No cowboy ever painted a town as red as Jones paints hell. He doesn't know any more about hell than his co-worker of Brooklyn does of heaven, but you would think he did, from the way he handles his figurativ brushes, and slaps on the red paint, with yellow-of-brimstone touches. While Talmage is trying to coax us into heaven with promises of celestial mint-juleps, so to speak, of never-ending deliciousness, Jones is trying to scare us into the abode of bliss and glory with threats of "blue blazes" being held to our lips for all eternity, and of which we must drink and keep drinking forever, without a let-up of a moment. My readers can take their choice of Talmage and Jones, and be coaxed or scared into heaven, as they like.

A "down-east" parson at a camp-meeting, at the close of a "love feast," when surrounded by the "sisters," remarked that he was thrice a widower, but felt a glorious satisfaction at knowing that he had been the means of sending all his wives to heaven, hinting that on that account he would be willing to extend his matrimonial record, looking approvingly at one of the sisters who flocked about him. Instead of reciprocating the amorous glance of the parson, the "sister" aforesaid bridled at once, saying:

"Well, you'll never hav the satisfaction of sending me to heaven, never! If any of the others want you to send 'em to heaven you just look at them and not at me." There was an immediate breaking up of the "love feast" aftermath.

The Prohibitionists are laying the flattering unction to their souls that they will one day run this entire aggregation of states. That they will is possible, but not very probable. But suppose they do, will their Prohibition prohibit? Has it "prohibited" in Maine? Does it "prohibit" in Rhode Island, Georgia, and the Western states, where it is pretended it prohibits? Not a bit of it—well, yes, it does a "bit" here and there, in some isolated place, but for a' that an' a' that, those who want the "prohibited" juice get it every time, and make the most of it. There is more rum drank to-day in Maine than ever, albeit ginshops are not in vogue; and the trouble is it is worse rum than in the days before "Prohibition." But as stolen fruit is the sweetest, so is "prohibited" gin the best flavored, malgre its degenerated quality, and people will hav it if only for spite because it is "prohibited." Do these one-idea men, these rule-our-stomach fanatics, imagin they are going to choke the Teutonic throat off its beer, the American and Irish throats off their whisky? If they do, there is only one term for them—Fools! The best or worst they can do is to bother us. But the more bother, the more we will drink when we get it. That is human nature, and the Prohibitionists will hav to prohibit that before they can successfully work the Prohibition racket. I hav used rum all my life, and intend to use it till death—"I" means a multitude, understand, myself included. I don't abuse it, never did, and don't think I shall; but there is no saving grace in that for me—for the multitude who use and not abuse—oh, no! Because Mike Dooly abuses rum, I am to be shut off from the use thereof! There are gluttons who abuse food. Why not choke them off from using food? It would be just as consistent, I think, the fact that I should succumb from starvation not militating in the least against consistency in the premises. There are those who abuse life in every way possible. Why not prohibit life? Cranks of this one idea—Prohibition—let me say to you that the only way in which you can establish Prohibition that will "prohibit" is to prohibit procreation. And don't you forget it!

To Whom Will the Infidels Apply?

The subscriptions for the relief of sufferers from the recent earthquake in Charleston, S. C., amount to considerable over one hundred thousand dollars, contributed from all sources. This is as it should be, and speaks well for the generosity of the American people. Now is the time for persons of abundant means to display their sympathy for suffering humanity.

But one fact in connection with this relief fund must fill the destitute Freethinkers of the stricken city (if such there be) with misgivings. The Charleston correspondent of the Baltimore American writes under date of September 8th:

"The subsistence committee is in full swing, and is serving out to-day ample rations of meat, bread, and sugar to all worthy applicants. The plan is to make the distribution hereafter upon the recommendation of the clergymen of the different denominations in the city."

This method of dividing the relief fund will undoubtedly cause it to be shared by a great many worthy religious people, but how is it to reach those not connected with the church? Does the subsistence committee imagin that only church communicants hav been afflicted, on the theory that "whom he loveth he chasteneth?" and hav the clergy shown themselvs to be so free from prejudice in all respects that they can be safely trusted with the direction of this great fund? The committee is perhaps doing its best to put the money where it will do the most good, but it has made a mistake in inviting the clergy to take a hand in the scramble.

Still in the Depths.

There are intelligent people who profess to believe that the work of Freethought is ended; that there is no longer any field for papers like THE TRUTH SEEKER; that superstition is dead; that the mists hav cleared away; that the Bible is no longer believed, or its teachings followed; that the world is drifting in the right direction, and that the only duty left for Liberals is to go about some other business, and let it drift. To the notice of such we would commend the following extracts, all of them from newspapers of recent date. Here is one from the New York Times:

"INDIANAPOLIS, Sept. 4, 1886.—A remarkable faith-cure is reported from Anderson, Madison county. The subject, Albert Wampler, thus relates his experience: 'About five years ago I was stricken with pains in my limbs. The doctors pronounced it rheumatism, and I was treated for that, but I failed to receive any relief whatever and continually grew worse. All at once, during a season of prayer held for my special benefit, I arose, laid aside my crutches, and walked unaided. The disease had deformed me so that I was unable to straighten up, but now, thank God, I am as straight as anyone.' Mr. Wampler is about twenty-seven years old, and he firmly believes he was cured through faith in prayer."

Of course, no one really diseased was ever cured by "prayer." On the other hand, the greatest evils hav arisen from this belief. Proper medical aid has been neglected; and victims of faith hav died when intelligent treatment might hav saved their lives. Yet that a belief in prayer-cures is still held by some is attested by the above instance, unless it be a newspaper fabrication, of which there is a strong likelihood. A test which would satisfy skeptics is that proposed some time ago by the Maine Farmer, i. e, the restoration of an amputated leg. Though scarcely more wonderful than the sudden cure of long-seated rheumatism, it would still be a better test.

The next is from the Morning Journal, published in this city:

"FOND DU LAC, WIS., Sept. 4, 1886.—The Rev. Father Keenan will, in a few weeks, make an interesting experiment. Aware of the fact that snakes will not liv in Ireland, he is going to see if they will liv in this country under the conditions which are believed to exist in Ireland. According to tradition, St. Patrick visited the Emerald Isle in the fifth century, and found it infested with snakes, but after blessing the soil the snakes vanished. Father Keenan sent to Ireland and secured some of the old, genuin turf, which is now in New York, ready for shipment here. He has obtained some snakes also, which he will place within the turf. If the snakes die, it will hav a tendency to prove the truth of the tradition, or that there is some peculiarity of the soil which is fatal to their existence."

One of two conclusions must be drawn from this: either that the priest, Keenan, is stupidly superstitious, or that he is a hypocrit.

Then, from the Charleston News and Courier, published at the scene of the recent earthquake, we obtain this:

"After the fire on King street broke out (Tuesday night), when the whole of the lower ward housetops were illuminated, a strange thing was seen. On the top of the ruins of the porch of the Main station was seen a cross, the emblem of Christianity, which shone with resplendent brightness. There never was a cross on this building as far as known, and the appearance of this one soon attracted attention, as it stood out of the ruins. A policeman—it is needless to say that he was an Irishman—pointed to it, and said, as he uncovered his head, 'It is that that saved us.'"

The Charleston correspondent of the New York World says that this apparition did not take place, but his denial will hav no weight with Catholics, who can see the sun dance on Easter morning, and who believe in the "lady of Lourdes" and the Virgin at Knock. When an intelligent man like Cardinal Newman avows: "I firmly believe that the saints in their lifetime hav before now raised the dead to life, crossed the sea without vessels, multiplied grain and bread, cured innumerable diseases, and superseded the operation of the laws of the universe in a multitude of ways," what can be expected from ignorant Catholics?

The next case is worse. The account is from the London Globe, and reads:

"A painful case of religious madness is reported by a Paris correspondent to hav just taken place in the Hautes Alps, near Braincon. Two sisters, named Marie and Catharine Olaguer, aged respectivly forty-seven and forty-five, lived there on a little property which they had inherited. They had also a sum of forty thousand francs, which was well invested. They were noted for their piety, and both had profound belief in miracles and the supernatural. Last Monday morning Catharine told Marie that she had had a vision in the night, in which God appeared to her and demanded a proof of her obedience in sacrificing her sister. Marie lent herself to this idea, which did not appear to her at all strange. So, after devoutly hearing mass on Tuesday morning, she came home to prepare herself to be a sacrifice. Catharine got a sharp razor, and cut with it into each of the arms in front of the elbow and into the instep of each foot. The victim kept repeating, 'Jesus, Marie, my hope, my savior!' Catharine then collected the blood, to dry it and keep it as a relic. When Marie was lifeless, her sister dressed the corpse in white, and went with the will of the defunct to a notary, to whom she related what she had done. She also said that, in obedience to God's command, she had burnt all the debentures and scrip belonging to her sister."

The insane acts of these two sisters prove their sincerity, and that sincerity had its root in religion.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav already heard of the Perfectionist craze at Cincinnati. Here is the latest feature of that delusion:

"The Rev. Duncan I. Jerome, a young Baptist preacher freshly graduated from Spurgeon's College, announces his conversion by the Walnut Hill, Cincinnati, Perfectionists and his abandonment of the Baptist Church. He says: 'We hold that Christian churches hav been tried and found wanting. We believe Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Brooks hav attained perfection, and that sinning to them is impossible. We do believe in the divinity of Mrs. Martin. She has as much divinity as Jesus Christ.'"

However far from the truth the Rev. Mr. Jerome may be in other respects, his closing remark, as given above, is undoubtedly true.

We now come to the most marvelous fabrication that has appeared in print since the last copy of the Bible left the press. The Globe-Republic, Springfield, Ohio, Aug. 5, 1886, is responsible for it:

"The most awful event in Ohio's history—a weird and horrible manifestation of the omnipotence of an angry God, if it be true—occurred some days ago near Lima, Allen county, Ohio. Sylvester Redyan was among the richest of Mercer county farmers. He was a brawny, black-browed, heavily-whiskered man of five and thirty years. He was in easy circumstances, and owned a fertil farm of several hundred acres. His family consisted of a wife and five children. Reydan, although generally respected, was so addicted to profanity that his oaths were constant and frightful. The fertility of Mercer county is well known; but the prospects for abundant crops this fall hav been almost, if not wholly, destroyed by a prolonged drouth, the effects of which hav been most noticeable in the wide and spreading corn-fields. The stalks, once sturdy and brightest of living green, slowly shriveled and faded into the sere and yellow of an untimely decay, and the once branching blades hung limp and lifeless. This condition of things maddened Redyan, and moved him to utter the awful blasphemy that cost him his life and semblance to humanity. On the day in question, he and four of his hands were sitting in the entrance of a small cave in a mass of sandstone overlooking a forty-acre field. The day was burning hot, and as Redyan looked out over the dreary waste of dying grain, his face grew dark with passion and discontent. He finally rose to his feet, his face aflame with insane rage, and shaking his fist with fury at the sky, shouted in ringing tones, 'If thou art a God descend and I will cut the heart from thy body!' The men shrank back appalled. For a single instant Redyan stood there, more like a brazen image than aught else, utterly powerless to move; then the heavens burst wide asunder, with a stunning shock, and a flaming bolt of fire descended, smiting and completely enveloping the blasphemous Sylvester Redyan, transfiguring him in the twinkling of an eye from mortal flesh and blood to a pillar of lifeless stone! Some time after the descent of the awful bolt, Redyan's hired help awoke to consciousness, to find themselvs strewn about in various postures on the ground in the shade of the rocks—awoke to huddle closely together, fairly frozen with horror, after one glance at the frightful object standing erect and rigid a few paces distant. Benumbed though their senses were, they felt and knew that Redyan was lifeless. The form there, just within the cave entrance, could not be that of a living being. The only thing human about it was its shape. It bore Redyan's head, broad shoulders, and massiv chest. It was almost devoid of clothing, and was vested with a grayish, stony appearance. The defiant attitude was wholly gone; the clenched hand had been lowered, and the head was inclined slightly forward. This much the men noted in their brief, fleeting glances. The men struggled to their feet. Their limbs almost refused to support them. They hung back, as if loth to approach the horrible object. Reluctantly the men advanced. With each step toward the cave entrance the air seemed to grow hotter, as if exuding from a fiery furnace. When within a few paces of Redyan, one of the men halted. 'This if awful—I can't go nearer!' he gasped. The others continued to advance. They put out their hands to grasp the upright, lifeless form. Then a wild shriek burst from their parched throats, and, turning, they fled as if pursued by a thousand demons. The figure was A LIVID, RED-HOT STONE.

"August Gebauer is a well-known saloon-keeper on West Main street. He was seen by a Globe-Republic reporter last night and told what he knew of the awful affair with marked agitation. 'Yes, I saw the Lima horror Friday afternoon,' said Mr. Gebauer. 'I went to Lima on business,' he resumed, 'and I took Mr. Black there with me. When we had finished our affairs we concluded to go see the stone man. There were so many conflicting reports rife in Lima that we more than half suspected we were going on a fool's errand; but we were not. The Redyan farm lies a mile and a half east of Lima, in a level stretch of cleared country, and is quite easy of access. The neighborhood is but thinly settled, and this fact accounts for the slowness with which the report of the awful occurrence spread. It happened in the southeast corner of a large corn-field, lying some distance from Redyan's house. It is needless to go into details as to how it occurred—you hav heard that. Suffice it that it did occur, and the sight I saw is such a one as I never want to see again. We found ourselvs in the front ranks of the throng and facing the narrow entrance to a cave in the rocks. My God! what a sight it was we saw! I shudder yet, and almost wish I had stayed away, for it has been constantly before me since that hour.' Even as he spoke a shudder went through Mr. Gebauer's sturdy form, and his voice was one of plaintiv earnestness. 'Yes, the corpse of the stricken blasphemer was there, standing in the cave. A number of men were at work striving to remove it. They worked with long iron crowbars, and kept their faces shaded or turned away, for the heat radiating from the body was frightful. But the efforts to dislodge or remove the corpse were of no avail, for as fast as they thrust the crowbars against it the solid iron melted and fell in trickling drops to the stony floor, while long, forked tongues of blue flame issued from the body, driving back the desperately battling men. While untouched the corpse emitted a faint, bluish glow, such as comes from stone nearly red-hot. The horrible thing still retains the form and features Redyan bore in life. The face is distinctly visible, set and rigid, while the eyes seem as if starting from their sockets. It is diabolical! Many days hav passed since the miraculous death of Redyan, and yet the heat is as fierce and blighting as when first noticed. Think of it! Solid iron melting and running down like water when applied to the body. Why, the heat is fiercer and more intense than that of the hottest furnace in existence. Of course Mrs. Redyan and her five children are prostrated with grief, sorrow, and despair. Both Allen and Mercer counties are shaken from center to circumference, and the throngs surging about the accursed spot are hourly increasing. My only regret is that I went to the place.'

"It may be added in conclusion that the C. C. & I. and I. B. & W. roads here hav both been literally besieged with requests to run an excursion to the scene of this visitation of divine wrath."

This account is not new, but it has never before been published with such particularity as the Globe-Republic has given it. Though it has been contradicted often, there are no doubt a certain gullible newspaper constituency in this country who believe it is true, in spite of its impossibilty.

If it be a fact that all the accounts of marvelous events which are here printed find their believers to-day, it is worth inquiring at what age of the world people were more deeply sunk in the depths of superstition, and when the activ, persistent advocacy of Secularism could hav been more necessary than at the present time.

A New Heresy.

The prospects are, as we learn from the New York Times, that the approaching annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions will be rent by a discussion of what is called "the heresy of a second or future probation." The objectionable doctrin consists in a belief that "there may be a period of probation after death for those who die in sin after having lived under Christian influences, and that in all probability there is such a period of probation for young children and savages to whom the gospel has not been preached." This new heresy has its origin at the Andover Theological Seminary, a Massachusetts institution where young men are prepared for the Congregational ministry, and has many adherents.

It is quite natural that those interested in the foreign mission enterprise should object to such a theory. In the books of disciplin of the various churches certain requirements are laid down as necessary to a complete Christian life—such as attending church and prayer-meetings, helping to support the preacher, dropping something into the contribution box, and subscribing for a religious paper. These are called the "means of grace," having no necessary connection with religious conviction, and they are insisted upon scarcely less strenuously than the necessity of belief. The reason is obvious: if the means of grace are neglected the minister's salary stops.

For similar reasons the commissioners of foreign missions deprecate the notion that there is any future probation for unbaptized heathen or babies, and cling to the comforting belief that—

> "Hell is crammed with infants damned
> Without a day of grace."

For if it be true that the heathen are to hav an opportunity after death to know and accept the gospel and to be forgiven and saved, why, they ask, should millions of money and the arduous labors of thousands of self-sacrificing men and women be devoted to the conversion of the same heathen while they are in life? If the obnoxious doctrin preached by Andover is to be accepted, this conundrum cannot be answered.

At the last annual meeting of the board the home secretary reported, says the Times, that in the preceding year no new missionaries had been obtained, and that at least one hundred were then needed. This report inspired many students with a desire to enter the missionary field. When these young men offered their services to the board they were informed that they were expected to accept "as a part of their doctrinal belief the dogma of the decisivness of the present life in respect to the eternal destiny of the heathen." Those who would not accept this were rejected.

It is sensible in the commissioners for missions to thus draw the lines tightly. A man holding to the doctrin of future probation of course might accept the position of missionary, because it has perquisits and emoluments; but he could not be expected to work for the present conversion of the heathen with the same enthusiasm that would be looked for in a person who believed in the "decisivness of this life." But there is a matter behind all this which none of the Christians appear to take into consideration. They profess to believe in an omniscient or all-knowing God. If such a being exists, he knows the future destiny of each individual on earth; and if the destiny of each individual is known, of necessity it must be already fixed; and if the destiny of each individual is already fixed, of what possible avail can be all the preaching and proselytizing for which such vast sums of money are annually expended? In overlooking so important a question as this, and discussing the problem of future probation, the commissioners for foreign missions are straining at a gnat after having swallowed a camel.

Editorial Notes.

WE hav received a copy of a pamphlet entitled, "The Haymarket Speech," by Albert R. Parsons, Anarchist. As this is the address for the delivering of which Mr. Parsons is sentenced to be hanged by the neck until he is dead, considerable interest attaches to it. The pamphlet is pnblished by the Chicago Labor Press Association, 76 and 78 Fifth avenue, Chicago, Ill., price ten cents.

JAY CHAAPEL, who lately severed his connection with the Liberal at Liberal, Mo., has been elected secretary of the Mississippi Valley Spiritualists' Association, which closed August 31st a very successful and pleasant session of a month. The society is in a prosperous condition, owning twenty acres of land, clear of all debt, covered with fine oak-trees, situated on a high and commanding bluff one mile from the Mississippi, and overlooking the city of Clinton. The floating debt was all paid off this year, and the season of 1887 will commence July 1st and continue two months. It has a free platform, and is said to be the only camp-meeting that does not make concessions to some kind of a God or religion.

THE Ironclad Age says:

"If a man can't be an Infidel without indorsing Anarchy; if he can't inveigh against soul-saving as the chief business of life without becoming a Socialist; and can't enjoy the comforting belief that death ends pain—ends all—without becoming a fanatic and a damned fool, the propagation of Freethought and mental liberty had better be suspended."

Though the conclusions here specified bear no relation to the propositions laid down, still, this is not the kind of talk we should expect from one who professes to make truth the object of his labors. Whatever happens, the propagation of Freethought and mental liberty must never be "suspended.' The sooner we learn the results of perfect freedom of thought and mental liberty the better, for not till then shall we be prepared to deal intelligently with the whole truth, whatever it may prove to be.

LAST week THE TRUTH SEEKER remarked, somewhat in extenso, upon the case of the Rev. Mr. Goodell, of Providence, R. I., whose wife has applied for a separation on the grounds of marital unfaithfulness. Simultaneously, it was stated, Mr. Foster, a Sunday-school superintendent in Pastor Goodell's church, asked for a divorce from his wife, with whom the Rev. Mr. Goodell had been guilty. It now appears that a half was never told. Later information discloses that the preacher and his Sunday-school superintendent hav executed the movement known as chassez, cross over, and change partners. One is a bad man and the other is no better. The parson charges that the Sunday-school superintendent's suit against him is intended to blind the public to his own moral obliquities. This complicates the matter considerably, and if the accusations on both sides are true, the most graceful thing for the parson and his Sunday-school superintendent to do is to subside, and withdraw themselvs from public observation. They are decidedly a bad lot.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Newark, N. J., Liberal League will hold its first fall meeting the third Sunday in September.

LIBERALS of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois may address J. L. Andrew at Brimfield, Noble Co., Ind., in care of Samuel Devenbaugh.

J. E. REMSBURG has made a few changes in his program for Iowa. The following is a list of his appointments for that state: Cresco, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, September 20th, 21st, and 22d; Deerfield, Thursday, 23d; Fredericksburg, Friday and Sunday, 24th and 26th; New Hampton, Saturday and Sunday, 25th and 26th; Busti, Monday, 27th; Bassett, Tuesday, 28th; Maynard, Wednesday and Thursday, 29th and 30th; Troy Mills, Friday, October 1st; Oelwein, Saturday and Sunday, 2d and 3d; Buffalo Grove, Sunday, 3d; Manchester, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, 4th, 5th, and 6th; Muscatine, Thursday, 7th; What Cheer, Friday, 8th; Montezuma, Saturday and Sunday, 9th and 10th; Sherman, Sunday, 10th; Hampton, Monday, 11th; Tama City, Tuesday and Wednesday, 12th and 13th; Grinnell, Thursday, 14th; Colfax, Friday, 15th; Osceola, Saturday and Sunday, 16th and 17th.

A MEETING of the Denver, Col., Secular Society was held September 5th, at the Albion Club room on Curtis street. The object of the meeting was to form a permanent organization. The movement was inaugurated by the recent lecture by Mr. Putnam at the Opera House. A meeting was called, and a temporary organization effected. There were about forty present, among whom were several ladies. Mr. Z. Shedd acted as chairman of the meeting. The committee which had been appointed to draw up a constitution and by-laws made a report, and submitted to the society a constitution and set of by-laws, which were read separately, and in the main adopted. The objects of the society are: "To encourage the exercise of the understanding; to stimulate discussion and free criticism; to elevate the mind above the authority and tyranny of superstitions; to investigate the truths of science; to disseminate correct ideas upon various social, political, and theological subjects; to promote complete and universal civil liberty; to urge the recognition of the Nine Demands, to the end that the true relations of Justice among all mankind may obtain, and that human welfare may prevail throughout this broad land." The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Thomas J. Truss; vice-presidents, Z. Shedd, J. D. Coplin, E. T. Webber, Charles Roth; secretary, J. G. Jenkins; financial and corresponding secretary, Miss Maggie Pattison; treasurer, Mrs. Coplin.

W. F. JAMIESON reached Butte City, Montana, on September 4th, and gave his first lecture on Sunday evening, having been introduced in a graceful speech by Dr. O. B. Whitfrd. The audience received the lecture with great cordiality. Monday morning the Butte Daily Miner contained the following: "An audience of about two hundred greeted Mr. Jamieson last night at the Renshaw Opera House, notwithstanding the fact that the night was anything but an inviting one so far as weather was concerned. The gentleman is quite a pleasing and entertaining, as well as an intelligent speaker. It will be necessary to increase the seating capacity of the house to accommodate those who will go to hear him next Sunday." Mr. Jamieson will deliver six more lectures in Butte, the Sundays of September, and is engaged to giv two lectures every Sunday during October in Bozeman. During week evenings he will giv courses of lectures in vicinity of Sunday appointments. Liberals, in any part of the territory, desiring Liberal lectures, should address him at Butte, Montana, care of Dr. Whitford.

DR. EDWARD AVELING, Socialist and Freethinker, arrived last week from London. His wife, a daughter of the late Karl Marx, accompanies him. They were met on arrival of the vessel at Jersey City by Theodore F. Cuno, of the New York Volks-Zeitung, and W. L. Rosenberg, secretary of the executiv committee of the Socialistic Labor party. On Monday Herr William Liebknecht, member of the German parliament, joined the two English delegates. Dr. Aveling and Herr Liebknecht are under engagement with the Socialistic Labor party to deliver a series of lectures in this country on Socialism. They will speak in the Cooper Union on Socialism on September 20th, and Trades Unions on September 22d. On September 19th their will be a meeting in their honor in Bromner's Union Park, Morrisania. Dr. Aveling is well known to our readers as a Freethought writer and lecturer, and as the author of the "Student's Darwin" and the "People's Darwin." He is anxious, if possible, to giv one or two addresses on Freethought, independently of his Socialist lectures. The friends at Philadelphia and Toronto are in negotiation with him to this end. Dr. Aveling's only vacant dates for New York are September 23d and 27th, and October 1st and 3d. On October 9th he is in Holyoke and on the 14th in Manchester, so that perhaps something could be arranged for the 10th. On October 16th he is in Boston, and October 18th St. Lawrence, leaving October 17th free. October 30th he is in Cleveland, and November 3d in Detroit; the intermediate days are free. He has at present no engagements between November 3d, Detroit, and November 8th, Chicago. All communications should be addressed to him at 62 East Fourth street. Dr. and Mrs. Eleanor Marx Aveling hav just issued a very outspoken pamphlet on the "Woman Question."

Call for the Tenth Annual Congress.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all Citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are invited to attend the Tenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held in New York city, at Chickering Hall, Fifth avenue and 18th street, on November 11th, 12th, and 13th, and also on Sunday evening, the 14th, a lecture by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which concludes the Congress.

Pursuant to a vote of the last Congress, notice is hereby given that the following amendments to the constitution of the Union will be acted upon: 1. To reduce the fee for life-membership from $25 to $10. 2. Or, on payment of $10 by applicant for membership, to authorize the secretary to issue ten-year membership certificates, with all the privileges of ife-membership during that time. 3. Whenever a man or woman has taken out annual membership certificates for three or five consecutiv years, such person thereafter on payment of annual-membership fee to possess the privilege of life-membership.

The Congress will also be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought, and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly Secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute-books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs in the Congress—the president and secretary and three delegates. All charter-members and life-members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executiv committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada, who can, will be present.

Per order of board of directors:

R. G. INGERSOLL, President.
SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.
COURTLANDT PALMER, Treasurer.
CHARLES B. REYNOLDS, Ch. Ex. Com.
E. M. MACDONALD, Ch. Fin. Com.

Letters from Friends.

KANSAS CITY, MO., Aug. 30, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to congratulate you on your ruling in the Anarchist trials. You discerned the violation of the right of free speech in Most's case when some did not, and your journal was the first and only one, so far, that could see and tell what was the significance of that judicial farce in Chicago. Not even Liberty or Lucifer has, as yet, protested.

I looked earnestly and impartially for legal evidence to prove their guilt; imagin my surprise, then, to find them not on trial. As soon as the verdict was announced, and the press had their say, I wrote a review of the decision, and sent it to Lucifer. I regard "incendiary," "obscene," and "blasphemous" speech as entirely constructional, and this decision means that the labor question in no form shall be agitated in Chicago. Yours truly, C. T. FOWLER.

DAVENPORT, IOWA., Aug. 31, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. J. L. Andrew, the noted English Freethought lecturer, spoke in Turner Hall here in this city on the 20th inst., and the Liberals were once more stirred up. His subject, "Liberty and Law," was handled in a masterly manner, and all those present spoke very highly of Mr. Andrew's delivery, logic, and wit. His other great lecture, "Modern Infidelity," was given in Moline Turner Hall the following evening, and in it, as in the one delivered here in Davenport, he very ably discussed the subject, holding the audience spell-bound for one hour and twenty minutes, irrespectiv of the troublesome heat.

Mr. Andrew, but a young man, will no doubt make his mark triumphantly in the Liberal field, and while his terms are so exceedingly liberal and his oratorical talent well worthy of appreciation, Liberals throughout the country should encourage him and make arrangements to hear him. Davenport's and Moline's Liberals express their best wishes, and they will at any future time be glad to hear him again on the rostrum defending the grand and noble cause of Freethought and reform. H. G. SCHARFENBERG,
Secretary Davenport Secular Society.

CLEOPATRA, MO., Sept. 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of your valuable paper about two years, and don't see how I ever got along without it. I am deeply interested in the labor movement. I eagerly read the letters of correspondents, and wish that more of the sisters would write. I think that we Liberals ought to be better acquainted. I must say that I thought that John R. Kelso's article on "Non-needy and Non-deserving United States Paupers" was just to the mark. It is the truth and was just. Would that we had more writers as fearless as he to expose the frauds practiced on the people of this nation by its rulers!

Go on, true friends of freedom; you will find friends to help you. I read eagerly every word from Aunt Elmina and Mrs. Dr. Juliet Severance.

There are a few Liberals around here. Three subscribe for your paper in this neighborhood, and there would be more but they hav not the backbone to stand the taunts of Christians. You can tell a true blue by the literature he takes.

Bravo, Watson Heston! Keep on with those blessed Bible scenes. The pictures are grand. If our dear Christian friends think the shadows are so awful, what would the reality be? But that is for heretics, you know—no danger of a Christian going to sheol. ANN E. STEWART.

SOUTH PRAIRIE, W. T., Aug. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The preachers of the United States are a great benefit to themselvs. They hav translated hell out of the Bible; that doesn't help the Bible much, but it helps hell out wonderfully.

I went to church not long since. The congregation were singing about the time Jesus washed their sins away. The preacher asked me afterward what I thought of the singing. I told him I thought Jesus had a tolerable big day's washing.

Christians hav a good recommendation—which they wrote themselvs.

Preachers expect to go from parasites of this world to paradise in the next world. Some of them are wise, and some are otherwise. I don't mean to condemn them all; there is a white sheep in every flock.

Suppose some one was to pray to hav the laws of gravitation reversed, then the world would fall on us.

Some members of the Young Men's Christian Association were caught stealing chickens in Washington territory. The society is now called the Young Men's Chicken Association.

The Christian religion kills a good man to reward him, and brings a bad one to life to punish him.

I don't believe anything exists that you can't kick; and I don't believe that any preachers exist that don't deserve to be kicked. Yours truly, GEORGE W. BOWMAN.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Sept. 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to report from this part of the country. Our League meetings are adjourned during the summer months, yet the labor movement has been quite activ preparing for the coming fall election.

I hav just returned from Mt. Pleasant Park camp-meeting, in Clinton, Iowa, and I am proud to say that we had a platform for free discussion of all subjects pertaining to humanity. The camp lasted one month, with meetings every day. The labor question was ably discussed, as well as religious, political, and social reforms. A person attending all the meetings would learn something to his advantage; it could not be otherwise, for in free discussion you hear all sides of a question, and this seems to me to be the only true way of arriving at the truth.

And I am glad there is one Spiritualist camp-meeting in this great country whose sessions are devoted to the best interests of humanity, and which will maintain practically a free platform. Camp-meetings run by Spiritualists in the interest of God and the angels seem a waste of time, for it does not strike me that they need our consideration as much as the people do here on our earthly plane. Let us help to make this world as good as we can, and I think we shall hav enough to do and shall need all the opportunity for consulting on the best way and means to make this world brighter and better. A. B. SEVERANCE.

NEW YORK, Sept. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: An obscure sheet called the Brooklyn Union, whose circulation is principally confined to a few local fossils of the Jonah gastronomical school, clearly enough emphasizes its own coarseness and intellectual asininity by the following undoubtedly "divine inspiration:"

THE TRUTH SEEKER, a coarse, disreputable organ, representing New York Infidels of the Ingersoll school, clearly enough indicates the trend of its own teaching by a bitter editorial protest against the conviction of the Chicago Anarchists. From the level of the hog to that of the hangman would appear to he the normal gravitation of the American Infidel of this type (Issue of Sept. 4, 1886).

A little comment by yourself on this latest phase of "divine omniscience" might interest some of your subscribers.
JAMES W. DARE.

[We do not feel like making any extended remarks on this tirade. Those who hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER know that the Union is guilty of gross misrepresentation. Anarchism is not a logical outcome of Infidelity. Some Infidels believe in it, and some do not, while some Anarchists are Infidels and some are not. It makes no difference what their religious views are; when men are indicted for being unpopular, and sentenced to be hanged for being indicted, it is the duty of some one to protest; and THE TRUTH SEEKER has not protested any more strongly than papers conducted by Christians. Mr. John Swinton, for instance, a Christian, lets no opportunity pass for denouncing the judicial farce at Chicago. Why does not the Brooklyn Union point to that fact as illustrating the trend of Christianity? To paraphrase the closing remark of the above extract, we might say that from the level of an idiot to that of a malicious blackguard would appear to be the normal gravitation of some Brooklyn newspaper writers.—ED. T. S.]

GREAT VALLEY, N. Y., Aug. 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The cartoons that hav thus far come to me in the old, reliable TRUTH SEEKER now adorn one side of my bar-room, and I must confess they make quite an attractiv picture-gallery, attracting the eye and instructing the mind of the public generally, so far as I am able to judge from the interest that people take in scanning and pointing out to me the lifelike and truthful character of many features that I in my dullness had not perceived until pointed out to me and illustrated.

Even our orthodox friends don't pretend to deny that the pictures are true to life—at least, in the main, and so far as heard from yet. But I hav heard it hinted that it is believed by some of the more thoughtful ones that Brother Heston must hav drawn on his imagination to an unwarrantable extent to hav given the voice of God walking in the garden physical structure. They think they are dead sure on that point, since God never can be seen by mortal view. On this point we shall hav to grant them a double score—at least, if their premises are correct. But, then, if we wished to be fastidious or technical, we might as a rejoinder read to them from the word of God how he showed a part of his august personage to Moses, and how Moses through his familiarity with God did behold him face to face, as one man looketh upon another man. And, again, Brother Heston might hav taken his duplicate from that third part of God who did appear and was seen by many, the Lord Christ Jesus, the veritable God made manifest in the flesh. Hence I doubt not after seeing this lucid and simple explanation, our heretofore opposing friends will readily see where Brother Heston got his model from in giving physical proportions to the great "I am that I am." But since only this feature of our greatest living artist is objected to as yet by our opposing friends, I shall not insist in my pleading on holding them to the strict letter of God's law, so, should the world's great critics see fit to grant them a score, I shall not complain—no, no! My only thought when I started my picture-gallery was to entertain my guests and neighbors gratis. But I don't know but I shall be obliged to ask a fee in order to liv a more quiet life, and in part to suppress the throng of curious amateurs, for no later than last evening my bar or picture room was thronged with a motley crowd of from twenty-five to fifty people, discussing and pointing out the life features of ye olden times, by our very modest and modern artist, Watson Heston. Of course there are a few who look and run away, only to come and look some other day.

BROOKLYN, E. D., Sept. 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been debating with myself for some time the propriety of throwing up my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I cannot find it in my heart to do it. I am determined to set a good example; for the spirit of our friend, Bennett, is ever before me (for, unfortunately, I believe in spirits, to the horror of Aunt "Elmina").

On the main, THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing a mighty deal of good. Like the coulter to the plow, it is the first to encounter the hard knocks of the boulders of superstition, which the plowshare gently exposes to our sight, with its brambles and weeds, to undergo the grand harrow of scientific research.

One motiv which induces me to continue my subscription is this. I come occasionally in contact with ladies and gentlemen of a mild, fashionable Christian type of thinkers, who borrow my paper, first to look and laugh at its cartoons; but, what is strange, I seldom see the paper again. Well, let the paper go on if it will do them any good. THE TRUTH SEEKER is something like the good old lady's pills—it is mighty "s'arching."

As editor of a truth-seeking journal, I suppose you feel it a duty to lay before its readers any communication gravely and honestly placed before them for their consideration. In this connection, I was surprised on reading an article on Anarchy, by Stevens, published in your issue of August 28th. Perhaps I am too thick-skulled to absorb this modern idea of unrestrained liberty. It is true, the great inequality in the possession of wealth, and its consequent power over the earth, either for good or evil; the malfeasance in public office and the maladministration of law operate as a great provocation to the honest thinker, and almost tempt desperate men to do desperate deeds. But Stevens and his Anarchists should remember the danger of unrestrained liberty.

That there is a wide difference in the public mind and that of Anarchists on the subject of Anarchy is very apparent from the repletion or overflowing of our state and county criminal prisons. Alas, students and patriots in this phase of philosophy, pickpockets and burglars, too often wake up and find themselvs inmates within their gloomy walls—merely a difference of opinion, you know!

It is surprising how some writers will trifle on this subject of human rights. I think it was Butler who unfeelingly wrote,

> No rogue e'er felt the halter draw
> With good opinion of the law.

The immortal Shakspere wrote a long time ago, and therefore is excusable in inditing the then supposed aphorism, "Why were laws made, but that we are rogues by nature?"

Please giv me credit for the inclosed $3. D. BRUCE.

WATERVILLE, MINN., Sept. 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am a recent subscriber to your paper, and can sincerely say that I am very much pleased with it. Although brought up in the faith once delivered to the saints, I early went astray, the prime cause being, I think, reading religious papers such as the Watchman and Reflector, of Boston, and the Christian Union, of New York, with others of similar character. Perplexing questions often arose in my mind, and when I questioned those in spiritual power, I was frequently told that such things could not be explained, but that it was all right, and that all that was needed was faith; and as I could never bring myself to hav faith in anything that was directly opposed to all laws of common sense and reason, I gradually drifted away, and began looking after truth wherever I could find it. From what I can observe, it is hard to think that any Christian believes what he preaches. For example, we hav been having in this country a severe drouth, and consequently many prayers for rain. Now, I hav never seen anyone attending a meeting where these prayers were made take an umbrella with him. Another and more painful illustration was given me a few days ago in confidence, which I trust I shall not violate by repeating it. A physician was recently called to attend a lady in a case of confinement. When he arrived he found her in a terrible condition, in which she had been for over a day, and had the doctor not arrived when he did she would soon hav died. Her idiotic Christian husband was kneeling at the foot of the bed, praying to his God to help her out of her trouble, and this was all he proposed doing for her. In thirty minutes after human aid was present she was saved. Now, there are weak-minded persons who will say that the doctor's presence was an answer to prayer; but if he had not been sent for by unbelievers, the woman would hav died.

Notwithstanding that I air my peculiar views on religious subjects on all occasions, the Almighty has not seen fit to sit down on me as yet, although within two weeks one young convert has had his house blown over, and an Episcopal church and the house of a good church-member hav been struck by lightning. Had any of those things happened to me, it would hav been a dispensation of providence. As it is, they roll their eyes and wonder how it can be so.

While I am in entire sympathy with your expressed views on religious matters, I hav no liking for those who would overthrow our form of government. That it needs much alteration, there can be no question; but, even as it is, it is the best on the face of the earth, and the most perfect that man or God has yet devised.

Hoping that THE TRUTH SEEKER may always be published, and hav a long subscription list, I am, Ever its friend, L. ALEXANDER.

PALATKA, FLA., Aug. 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: If L. L. Northup, Materialist's, head, near its crown, is no flatter than those of the rest of us amateur correspondents, he will not object to the notice I shall take of him. His letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 7th reminds me of a wish I hav for more than a year entertained, to be able to send you something for publication that might hav the effect, either upon yourself or your correspondents, to at least lessen, if not wholly check, the discussion of Spiritualism in the columns of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, whose space is of far too much value to be occupied by speculations upon a subject that has entirely passed beyond the speculativ field, and fairly entered that of the scientific.

If Spiritualism, so called, is not a science, it is nothing, and with more than an ordinarily extensiv acquaintance with Spiritualists and their individual conceptions of the subject, I know none at the present day who were able to tell you the difference between the meaning of the words natural and supernatural, and who, defining Spiritualism, would tell you it was a religion. Nevertheless, there are religionists who are also Spiritualists, as there are religionists who are also astronomers and evolutionists, and both alike often associate their knowledge upon these respectiv subjects with their religious beliefs in such a manner as to justify the uninitiated in assuming that it is all of the same piece.

Mr. Northup says: "I hav had occasion at times to speak of the pernicious and demoralizing influence of Spiritualism and religion (as I consider both in the same light), and the postal [received by him evidently from a crank] confirms all my previous convictions and statements." In the above quotation Mr. Northup develops two very weak points in his mode of investigation: First, by assuming a relation of which he has no adequate proof, and then by accepting as a confirmation thereof, and of other dogmatic assertions, the "effusions" of a crank limited to the capacity of a postal card. Evidently Mr. Northup is poorly informed upon the real subject of (so-called) Spiritualism, and, with the utmost respect, I would suggest that he try his lance with D. Priestley (in last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER) on the yet live and eminently speculativ question of Prohibition.

In confirmation of the somewhat dogmatic assertion that "Spiritualism is a science if it is anything," and therefore should be discussed, if discussed at all, only on that basis, I need but to remind you of the fact that its conclusions are claimed to be entirely based upon natural phenomena, observable to the natural senses, and that it makes no claim whatever to supernatural agency or favor, but holds itself strictly amenable at all times to demonstrated truth.

LEWIS MORRIS.

HEBER CITY, UTAH, Aug. 28, 286.

MR. EDITOR: As my father-in-law, my brother, and myself are the only readers of your valuable paper in Wasatch county, we must endeavor to keep our small lights burning. We may be able to show our Mormon friends it is possible to liv lives of honor without being subject to priestly power, although we hav had a hard time this last winter. To explain this I will giv you an introduction to our family. Mr. James Watson is the father of three daughters. Joseph Thomas married the eldest, myself the next, and Mr. Edion Oaks the third. Consequently we are considered the Infidel family. In the beginning of February last, Mr. Thomas's children were taken sick with that awful disease, pneumonia. After three weeks' nursing we got the children through all right, but Mr. Thomas took sick, and, being so nearly worn out waiting on his children he so dearly loved, lasted only four days. Mrs. Thomas, being a woman of a nervous temperament, could not bear the loss of her ever-loving and affectionate husband, and succumbed to her trouble and died broken-hearted, making only fifteen days between their deaths. Of course it was seemingly a fine opportunity for orthodox friends, and they did not fail to take advantage of it. You could hear it whispered around, "Is that not awful? You would think it would be a lesson to the rest of them." But in the mean time, when Mrs. Thomas was sick, the Mormon elders took advantage, in the absence of relations, and laid hands on her, claiming it was her request, and as there seemed to be a slight improvement for a day, the news spread all through the town that the Lord had showed his power through his servants, and made whole a woman whom the doctor had given up. After all this, the one who had taken the lead in having hands laid on Mrs. Thomas made the expression in the graveyard that perhaps her death was the best thing that could happen, as it might save the children being raised in unbelief. And yet our troubles were not ended. Mr. and Mrs. Oaks had a little five-year-old girl sick at the same time the others were, only lingering longer, being buried just twenty days after Mrs. Thomas; but as Mrs. Oaks is a sensitiv woman, and seeing the advantage gained by our Mormon friends in taking lead at the burial of her sister and brother-in-law, she positivly refused to hav any one take part in the services over her child who had never called to see her through her long illness. I think a woman who has the courage to stand by her convictions in the midst of such trouble is worthy the respect of every true Infidel. I don't wish to giv the idea that there are no kind and feeling people among our Mormon friends; they are just like all other religious people—hundreds of them are ten times better than their creed.

Perhaps I hav made my letter too long already, so I will close by saying, Long life and success to THE TRUTH SEEKER. And as I hav had notification that my year's subscription has expired I will renew and send two dollars extra to help repair Brother Reynolds's tent which God-loving people destroyed. With kindest regards to yourself and the Booth family who stood by Mr. Reynolds in his trouble. JAMES LINDSAY.

RUM AND BLOOD, BLOOD AND RUM.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Sept. 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav refrained from sending you any communications on the subject of Prohibition for a long time, because I hav no desire to expend any more of my energy upon your waste-paper basket. John R. Kelso, A.M., demands replies to his vaporings on this subject, and seems to imply not only that his arguments are invincible, and his own intelligence overwhelming, but that there is no Prohibitionist living who has either the courage or the ability to assail the one or refute the other.

When satisfied that THE TRUTH SEEKER welcomes the words of Prohibitionists to its columns as well as those of the whiskyites, I shall endeavor to be the St. George to this horrible dragon who drinks whisky, breathes fire, and froths up misery every day. Why do I write you to-day? Why do I honor your waste-paper basket once more? Why, simply because you published in your number of Sept. 4th an article by J. L. Andrew. Nothing more shameful than his effusion ever disgraced the columns of any newspaper in this world before. His atrocious stories about the sayings and doings of Prohibitionists are unworthy of belief. I now declare them to be lies. These are my reasons: He givs no names of persons or of places, nor indicates the times of said occurrences. All his stories should hav been begun in these words: Once upon a time, in a far-away country, and a great many years ago, there lived a certain man, etc.

Your readers cannot fail to find answers to the rumitick's arguments in the daily papers, and in the returns at the ballot-box. The saloon, my dear fellow, is going, going—we will soon cry, gone. Be prepared to send your red nose along with it.

While I hav my hand in I want to say one other thing to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Even Freethinkers, it will be discovered, are persons of common sense and decency, who cannot always afford to allow their class papers to misrepresent them on almost every question of the hour. We are not murderers nor the friends of murderers. We do not claim that it is one of the inalienable rights of citizenship to set mad dogs on those who do not agree with us. The wild animals that are to be hanged at Chicago cannot be saved by us from their well-deserved fate. The new command has gone out over the world: They who wilfully take the lives of others with bombs shall perish at the gallows or the block. Thus it should ever be. Hav they a grievance, let them go forth and instruct the world. Let them show their wrongs, their wounds, their sufferings, to a sympathetic world. The success of Prohibition lies in the fact that its sober, tender-hearted men and women go to society and as best they may tell the story of agony, poverty, and misery this horrid traffic has so long cursed the world with. They fire no buildings, kill no rum-sellers. They never meet to tell each other to kill the reporters present; to kill the policemen in the streets; to teach each other the art of manufacturing dynamite. Perhaps if Prohibitionists would do these things, they could stir a fellow-feeling in the bosom of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Unless you mean to make THE TRUTH SEEKER in the future useful, instructiv, and helpful to the human race, by exactly reversing its present position in relation to Anarchy and temperance, I should suggest that you place the following at its head as the motto of its choice: "Rum and Blood, Blood and Rum." LIBERTA.

[If we bore our correspondent a grudge, which we do not, we should feel that in laying the foregoing unreasonable and intemperate communication before our readers we had secured a revenge more deep and lasting than anything we could hav the cruelty to wish for. After perusing it, no room will be left for inquiring why some of "Liberta's" previous articles hav found their way into the waste-basket, to which a due consideration for the author would perhaps consign the present one.

We may differ with "Liberta" as to the most efficient method of curtailing or entirely doing away with the liquor traffic, but that is not a good reason why he should denounce THE TRUTH SEEKER as a rum organ. We probably would not always agree with him in defining capital offenses. Does that justify him in saying that this paper advocates bloodshed and murder? We cannot admit that it does.

Prohibition may be a practical scheme, or it may be impracticable. Those who do not think it practicable should certainly hav accorded to them the liberty of saying so. The same holds good with reference to its constitutionality. If there are two sides to the question, let both sides be represented by argument. Abuse on either side or both sides will never settle the matter. And here we would recommend to "Liberta" a study of the calmly philosophical style of Mr. D. Priestley, as illustrated by his letter in our issue of July 31, 1886. There he will find argument met with argument in a way that must be pleasing to all admirers of courtesy in discussion. Then let him calmly reread all we hav had to say about the Chicago or any other Anarchists, and find out if we hav asked for them anything more than the fair trial and just verdict to which every American citizen charged with crime is entitled.—ED. T. S.]

FORKS CREEK, COL., Aug. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I became a subscriber to your valuable paper about one year ago, while at Custer City, Idaho Territory, and hav been a constant reader and admirer of it ever since.

When my brother, B. L. Smith, came to Colorado, he sent you a renewal of the subscription. He had it sent to his address, but as we do business in partnership, it is all the same. I make this statement merely to let you know that I am not a "backslider" from Liberalism. We take several Liberal papers, but could not get along without the old TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav been an outspoken Freethinker for about two years, and hav no desire to go back into the arms of the church. On the contrary, I thank God, as it were, every day of my life than I am free from the blighting curse of superstition.

My parents were devout Christians, and the first words I remember ever saying were the Lord's Prayer lisped at my mother's knee. I was taught to revere every word within the lids of the Bible. To doubt any of its teachings or sayings was almost an unpardonable sin. An Infidel was the most despicable thing on the face of the earth, and always called upon God for mercy when he came to die.

My father was ever telling us of the goodness of God and that he created all things, and in a conversation one day one of my little brothers asked him who made God. His reply to that question was: "Shut up, sir! That is an Infidel question. Don't you ever dare to ask such a question again."

But my parents taught their children to despise everything that was bad and immoral, and I never heard my father utter one word or syllable that would not hav been appropriate in the most refined society. They prayed daily for the conversion of their children, but we did not take to religion readily, although we believed it was all right and some time we would understand all about it, be converted, and finally go to heaven.

I well remember my first impressions of doubt and disbelief. In the year of 1878 I was attending the Raisin Valley Seminary and Dr. Test, the principal, gave several lectures on geology, in which he made the statement that animal remains had been found beneath different strata of geological formation, and these animals must hav existed thousands of years prior to the creation as recorded in the Bible. I knew that either one or the other was wrong—either geology or the Bible—and I thought to doubt the word of God was a terrible thing. There was a revival near the school that winter, and as I wanted to do what was right and get light on the subject of religion, I attended the meetings, and finally got it into my head that I was converted. I prayed to God to giv me light and take away my doubts, but somehow I couldn't catch on. Pray as I would, I could get no light, and this geological affair was always coming up to giv me trouble. I often asked myself the question: Am I getting to be an Infidel? I was in the deepest abyss of gloom. I knew not if there was a God above; if I was a thing of chance; if beyond the bounds of this gloomy present there is annihilation or a hereafter. I said, "O God, if thou art, solve me these doubts and giv me light!"

I would not for all the world hav had my friends know that I harbored such doubts, and thought time would make it all clear to me.

I finally left school and went to the northern part of the state to teach, but still kept up my studies by joining the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific circle, and as I studied astronomy, geology, philosophy, and chemistry, they each led me farther from what I sought—a reconciliation with the Bible and Christian teachings. I still attended the Methodist Episcopal church, but took little interest in it, as I heard no new ideas advanced.

As yet I had never read any Freethought works. I would not, as I had been taught from my very infancy that all such were morally corrupt and ruinous to both soul and body, especially "Tom" Paine's "Age of Reason." And to make matters worse, my brother "Ben" married into an Infidel family, a daughter of Alexander Campbell, of Elk Rapids, Mich., an old-time subscriber to the Boston Investigator, and an Infidel in every sense of the word. I had nothing against my brother's wife. She was good, and kind, and intellectual, but she was an Infidel, and my brother soon openly professed his Infidelity.

As time passed on I taught five consecutiv terms of school in what was known as the Campbell district, near Elk Rapids, Mich. The majority in the district were Methodists, and the first thing I heard was what a terrible man Campbell was. As a director of the school he had robbed the district of money; as supervisor of the township he had defrauded the people, and he was a despot in his family, and he had even gone so far as to plaster the schoolhouse on the holy Sabbath day. I did not care to become acquainted with any such man, and, by the way, I guess the feelings were mutual, for he seemed very indifferent about making my acquaintance. I dreaded to see him come to the school-house, but, nevertheless, he would come, discharge his duties as an officer, and leave—and to me it was a relief, and why? Because my early teachings were such that I felt the presence of a disbeliever of divine revelation to be contaminating to morality. His little daughter, Maud, was always a regular attendant at the school, and she did not look as if she had a very hard time of it at home. Her cheeks were always rosy and her face always wore a smile. She would whisper in school contrary to the rules, and sometimes neglect her lessons, but never would she tell a lie to screen herself from any punishment. I knew she received these impressions and a reverence for the truth at home. I knew that a man who would teach his children such principles could not be very bad, so I determined to investigate. I became more thoroughly acquainted with Campbell, asked him about the reports circulated through the neighborhood in regard to his dishonesty, when, to my surprise, he showed me receipts and statements which proved conclusivly that the reports were wholly false. When I asked him why he did not vindicate himself, he replied by saying, "I consider the whole set are beneath my notice."

By this time I had more respect for Infidelity and less for Christianity, and resolved to investigate to the bitter end, even if I had to read Paine's "Age of Reason." I knew if Christians would lie about one Infidel they would about another.

At this time I was boarding at Mr. Campbell's and had access to several works on Liberalism. I read Colonel Ingersoll's lectures; Remsburg's "False Claims" and "Bible Morals." I had read the Bible considerably, but had no idea there was such indecency in it. The veil was rent. I beheld Christianity in all its hypocrisy. I threw it from me as I would a venomous snake. I stepped beyond the pale of theology into the beautiful field of reason, and day by day as I read and investigate I am convinced that this is the only true source of happiness.

In conclusion I send you $1.25 for McDonnell's "Heathens of the Heath," and 25 cents for the motto, "Reason is the Lamp of the Mind, the Only Torch of Progress;" 20 cents for two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER in which you publish this letter; one to be sent to W. H. Smith, and one to Alex. Campbell, Elk Rapids, Mich. CHARLES E. SMITH.

A Dinner and a Kiss.

Selected by E. W. Chamberlain.

"I hav brought your dinner, father,"
The blacksmith's daughter said,
As she took from her arms a kettle,
And lifted its shining lid.
"There's not any pie or pudding,
So I will giv you this—"
And upon his toil-worn forehead
She left a childish kiss.

The blacksmith tore off his apron,
And dined in happy mood,
Wondering much at the savor
Hid in his humble food,
While all about were visions
Full of prophetic bliss;
But he never thought of the magic
In his little daughter's kiss.

While she with her kettle swinging,
Merrily trudged away,
Stopped at the sight of a squirrel,
Catching some wild bird's lay.
And I thought how many a shadow
Of life and fate we would miss
If always our frugal dinners
Were seasoned with a kiss!

Spring-time; or, The Little Poet.

(CONCLUDED.)

"Who takes care of you?"

"I liv at the poorhouse."

"And they are unkind to you, and you hav no one to love you?"

"No," sobbed Flossie.

Gertie clasped the little form in her arms, saying, "I will love you, darling; would you like to be my little sister?"

"Yes, oh, yes."

That evening Gertie wrote home. The following is an extract:

I hav a little scholar—her name is Flossie Stanhope—whom I think much of. She is ten years old, but looks two or three years younger, she is so small and slight. She has the loveliest blue eyes and amber curling hair, and—isn't it terrible?—she is an orphan and a pauper. She writes poetry. I inclose a copy of some she wrote on her slate today, which I think is wonderful for a child of her age to compose. I hav promised to be her sister. Can you not find room in your hearts and home, dear papa and mamma, for one more daughter?

Lovingly, GERTIE.

In a day or two came the reply from her mother:

MY DEAR CHILD: I hasten to reply to your letter. I am glad that next Friday closes your school, for your parents are both longing to see you. Bring dear little Flossie, for I know she is my dear sister Florence's little girl—the sister who father thought married so poorly, and disowned in consequence. I was away at school at the time, but was immediately summoned home after she left. I never could learn her address so I could write to her, and if she ever wrote to me, as I think she must hav done, father kept her letters from me. Florence was a poet, and also her husband, Arthur Stanhope. I long to see her, my only sister's little girl. I am to see you so soon, dear Gertie, that I will write no more now. MOTHER.

That evening Gertie told all she knew of Flossie's history to Mr. and Mrs. Jason, and her friend Minnie. Mr. Jason readily promised to see the overseer of the poor the next day, and acquaint him with the facts in regard to Flossie.

"There will be no trouble," he said, "about getting the child. Let me think—to-morrow is Friday."

"Yes, papa," replied Minnie, "and the last day of school, and the scholars are to speak pieces, sing songs, etc., and we must visit them and Gertie in the afternoon."

As the afternoon session was about to close, Mr. Jason drove up with his beautiful span of grays and two-seated carriage.

"I couldn't get around any earlier," he apologized, after the children were all dismissed and the visitors had left; "but I am glad wife and Minnie were in time to hear and see all, and I am in time to carry you all home. Here, wife, you sit on the front seat with me, and let the young people sit back. Bring Flossie, Gertie. It is all right; there she is at the corner of the school-house."

Gertie stepped to her side, and found her weeping and sobbing bitterly, and took her hand, saying,

"Don't cry, darling, but come and ride with me to Mrs. Jason's."

"Mrs. Williams will whip me if I ride with you, because I shall be late home; but I guess it will kill me if I don't see you any more, and so I will go."

"Come, girls," called Mrs. Jason; "these horses are getting very restless, and won't stand much longer."

"Come, dear, spry," said Gertie; "and think no more of Mrs. Williams, for she will never whip you again."

Flossie looked with wondering eyes into Gertie's face after they had entered the carriage, and were on the way to Mr. Jason's.

"When we reach the house, Flossie, I will explain it all to you."

After the explanation Flossie was nearly wild with joy. She sang, and danced, and hugged her cousin by turns, while her face was all aglow.

After a while they missed her, and found her outside with her slate and pencil, with the following verse written thereon:

Oh, the bud and bloom of flowers in spring,
What joy and gladness to my heart they bring!
And singing birds so joyous and free,
So merrily trilling from tree to tree,
Attuning my soul to thoughts grand, sublime,
As I look, and listen, and pen this rhyme!

"But it is not spring-time now, Flossie."

"It is spring-time to me," she declared.

Who Sets the Fashions?

Who sets the fashions, I'd like to know,
For the little people beneath the snow?
And are they working a weary while,
To dress themselvs in the latest style?

There's Mrs. Primrose, who used to be
The very picture of modesty.
Plain were her dresses, but now she goes
With crimps and fringes and furbelows.

And even Miss Buttercup puts on airs,
Because the color in vogue she wears;
And as for Dandelion, dear me!
A vainer creature you ne'er will see.

When Mrs. Poppy—that dreadful flirt—
Was younger, she wore but one plain skirt;
But now I notice, with great surprise,
She's several patterns of largest size.

The Fuchsia sisters—those lovely belles!—
Improve their styles as the mode compels;
And though everybody is loud in their praise,
They ne'er depart from their modest ways.

And the Pansy family must hav found
Queen Elizabeth's wardrobe underground.
For in velvets and satins of every shade
Throughout the season they're all arrayed.

Pinks and Daisies and all the flowers
Change their fashion, as we change ours;
And those who knew them in olden days
Are mystified by their modern ways.

Who sets the fashions, I'd like to know,
For the little people beneath the snow?
And are they busy a weary while,
Dressing themselvs in the latest style?

1.—RIDDLE.

I hav an actual and palpable existence in the world, and hav had for hundreds of years. I am not an unfamiliar object, but make myself useful in almost every home in the land. You young folks who guess riddles hav seen me hundreds of times—see me almost daily. If it will shorten your search for me, this much I will say, that if you look for me in books or manuscripts you will probably nowhere find me, for in books, either printed or written, I am nowhere named.

In order to still further circumscribe your field of search, I will say, what is true, that I am even now palpably and visibly in your presence.

Correspondence.

DEL MAR, CAL., Aug. 29, 286.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We just moved down to this beautiful county of San Diego from a church-ridden town of Pomona, in Los Angelos county, where there are ten churches and only eighteen hundred population. We liv twenty miles from San Diego, and two and one-half miles from the ocean, on a ranch where we raised everything we wanted to eat since the 25th of March, with only two rains. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and would not be without it. I read the Children's Corner. I think the pictures on the front and back of the paper will break up Christianity. Well, I can't think of anything more to write, so I will close for this time.

The Mirror of Freethought.

BY ARTHUR B. MOSS,

FREETHOUGHT AND RADICAL ADVOCATE (of England).

SECOND EDITION.

Charles Watts's Literary Guide says: "We are glad to record the appearance of a second edition of this admirable book. The various papers—ten in all—are some of the author's best work."

The Middleboro News says: "These essays are brimming with careful thought and judicious research."

The Yorkshire Chronicle says: "These essays are not unworthy the attention of the scientific student though written for the uninitiated."

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical" for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents. For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

ELEMENTS OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY

FOR

HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2,000 years B.C. on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Slenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixon.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable. It may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Written in Prison. Suppressed by the Czar. The Author Over Twenty Years an Exile in Siberia. Russian Edition worth $600 a Copy. First American Edition Exhausted in Four Days. Second now Ready. An Elegant Volume of 330 Pages.

PRESS COMMENTS:

To call the book the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Nihilism is scarcely extravagance.—Boston Advertiser.

It is perhaps the book which has most powerfully influenced the youth of Russia in their growth into Nihilism, and it is remarkable and noteworthy as a work which has played so important a part in the political and social history of the century.—Boston Courier.

As a revelation of folk life it is invaluable; we hav no other Russian pictures that compare with it.—Providence Star.

The characters are so strongly and vividly drawn that the interest in their fate becomes intense as the thread of the narrativ is slowly unwound.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

When we come to consider the publication of such books as Flaubert's "Salammbo" and Tchernychewsky's "What's To Be Done?" we cannot avoid the conclusion that something must hav happened to the society for the suppression of indecent literature.—St. Louis Republican.

Poetry.

A Song of Rest.

O weary Hands! that, all the day,
Were set to labor hard and long,
Now softly fall the shadows gray,
The bells are rung for even song.
An hour ago the golden sun
Sank slowly down into the west;
Poor, weary Hands, your toil is done;
'Tis time for rest!—'tis time for rest!

O weary Feet! that many a mile
Hav trudged along a stony way,
At last ye reach the trysting stile;
No longer fear to go astray.
The gently bending, rustling trees
Rock the young birds within the nest,
And softly sings the quiet breeze:
"'Tis time for rest!—'tis time for rest!"

O weary Eyes! from which the tears
Fell many a time like thunder rain—
O weary Heart! that through the years
Beat with such bitter, restless pain,
To-night forget the stormy strife,
And know, whatever comes is best
Lay down the tangled web of life;
'Tis time for rest!—'tis time for rest!

—Anon.

Served Him Right.

Old Birch, who taught the village school,
Wedded a maid of homespun habit.
He was as stubborn as a mule,
And she as playful as a rabbit.

Poor Kate had scarce become his wife
Before her husband sought to make her
The pink of country polished life,
And prim and formal as a Quaker.

One day the tutor went abroad,
And simple Katy sadly missed him;
When he returned, behind her lord
She slyly stole, and fondly kissed him.

The husband's anger rose, and red
And white his face alternate grew.
"Less freedom, ma'am!" Kate sighed and said,
"Oh, dear, I didn't know 'twas you!"

—Oakland Echoes.

A Chapter on Millerism.

It was in the year 1831 that William Miller, a well-to-do farmer of Washington county, New York, rose up from a prolonged study of his Bible convinced that the prophet Daniel had clearly foretold just when the end of the world would be, and that to him had been given the key which unlocked the prophetical numbers revealing that some time between March 21, 1843, and March 21, 1844, Jesus Christ would come in person to judge the world. Twelve years was little time enough for plucking brands from the burning. William Miller was not an ordained minister of the gospel.

Now, his neighbors in Low Hampton, where lay his well-cultivated and unmortgaged two hundred acres of land, had said that if there was a man on earth who never bottled moonshine or dug wells in the air, William Miller was that man. He was a fair type of the prosperous Green Mountain farmer. His proverbial honesty and hard common sense made him a leading man in the community. He had been captain of brave men at the battle of Plattsburg. To his record as constable, sheriff, and justice of the peace had been added the laurels of the poet of Low Hampton. Then, he was a great book-worm in the eyes of his neighbors. He read the few books he owned and could borrow many times over. In his early middle life—for he was past fifty when he went forth to proclaim "the midnight cry"—he had shocked the religious sense of his passiv-brained townsfolk by reading Hume, Voltaire, and Paine, discussing and advocating their arguments with an ability few cared to oppose. But he finally returned repentant to the Baptist fold and began a devout study of the Bible. "I lost all taste for other reading," he wrote of this period, "and I applied my heart to get wisdom from God." He laid aside all aid but his Bible and Concordance. He began with Genesis, and left no verse behind that he did not think he clearly understood by comparison with collateral texts. "I found that all the prophecies that had been fulfilled had been fulfilled literally."

Then he became convinced that the popular doctrin of a temporal millennium before the second coming was fallacious; also the doctrin of the return of the Jews to Palestine before the end of the world. The next event in the history of the human race was to be its final judgment. He focalized his study upon the prophecies of the second coming. The result was his formulating as one of the articles of his belief: "I believe that the second coming of Jesus Christ is near—even at the door; that is, in or before 1843."

His theory of interpretation was founded on established principles of Protestantism. The Bible was to be interpreted literally; its figurativ language explained by collateral passages. Private judgment was to be unfettered in the search for truth. The then new and alarming heresy of Universalism was considered an illustration of what a spiritual interpretation might bring forth. Orthodoxy had been little disturbed in those days by philological research, geological discovery, and a philosophy of evolution. The infallibility of the writers, compilers, and translators of the sacred books was unquestioned by those calling themselvs Christians. The six days of creation meant six literal days. That there was to be an end to the world was a fundamental doctrin of the true faith.

He began preaching in the country churches around Low Hampton—his theme the speedy appearing; and so great was the revival wherever he held meetings, he could not begin to answer the calls from Baptist, Methodist, Congregational, and the so-called "Christian" (Campbellite) churches. It was after he began proclaiming his peculiar views that he received a license to preach from the Baptist church at Low Hampton. Wherever he went great multitudes pressed to hear him, and leading churches were opened for his lectures. This was in the beginning of his public life. The tide turned when his converts began their bitter attacks upon the churches, calling them "Babylon," and warning the believers in the blessed hope against remaining in their communion. There was a fascination to many in his prophetical charts and his mathematical solution of the mystical problem of the 2,300 days of Daniel's vision—in working out, like a lesson in arithmetic, the exact year when the third woe would be sounded, and the seventh trumpet, and just when "the stone would smite the image on the feet." How could there be a millennium when the little horn was warring with the saints? Had not the sun been darkened on that dark day of May 19, 1780, and had they not seen the last sign that was to precede the coming of Christ in the meteoric shower of November 15, 1833? When had there been such distress among the nations—such roaring of the winds and waves?

The keystone of William Miller's gospel was the prophecy of Daniel: "Write the vision and make it plain upon tables, . . . for the vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak and not lie; . . . it will surely come, it will not tarry."

He taught that the scriptures revealed just when the end would be. The prophecies were an unerring diagram. Whoso readeth let him understand. He never doubted in his simple soul that Josephus and Rollin were infallible as chronological authority. The vital point in his argument, which fixed the end of the world some time between March 21, 1843, and March 21, 1844, was the connection between the seventy weeks of Daniel and the 2,300 days. To one inclined to enter into a fair controversy upon the subject he would say:

"Open your Bible. That is to be your teacher alone. Now read the first three verses of the twelfth chapter of Daniel:

"(1.) And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book.

"(2.) And many of them that slept in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.

"(3.) And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

"Now read the sixth verse," Father Miller would say:

"And one said to the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?

"What wonders? The resurrection, of course. How long will it be to the resurrection? A time, times and a half. That's plain enough. Who swore it would be after that? Our Lord Jesus Christ. Now, if Christ himself, in answer to the question, How long shall it be to the resurrection? has sworn with an oath that it shall be for a time, times and a half, is not that telling just when it will be? What is meant by a time, times and a half? Read the sixth verse of the twelfth chapter of Revelation:

"And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and three score days."

"Now read the fortieth verse:

"And to the woman was given two wings of a great eagle that she might fly into the wilderness into her place, where she is nourished for a time, times, and half a time."

"Now, those two verses," Father Millc would say, "refer to the same period o time. It is the same as the 1,260 days. The same period is presented under different forms in several places. . . . Time, times, and a half is 1,260 days. Allow thirty days to a month, and twelve months to a year, and we hav three and a half years, equal to 1,260 days. Has not God revealed the time in days that must pass before the resurrection? How do we know how to reckon those days? Read Dan. vii, 25:

"And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws. And they shall be given into his hands until a time, times, and dividing of times."

Here Father Miller would make plain that the time mentioned was the time of the continuance of the saints in the power of the "little horn." The little horn meant the papacy. Time, times, and dividing of times, was a period of the same length wherever spoken of in scripture. Could it mean 1,260 literal days, when the persecution of the saints had extended far longer than that? If not 1,260 literal days, what then?

Read Num. xiv, 34:

". . . Forty days each for a year."

Now Ezek. iv, 6:

". . . I hav appointed thee each day for a year."

Admitting that days meant years, it was easy proving how the seventy weeks were fulfilled in 490 years, as many years as there were days in the seventy weeks; . . . 1,260 years from the time the decree of Justinian went into effect, A.D. 538 to 1798, when the papacy was subverted by Napoleon. The time sworn to by Christ himself meant the 1,260 years. . . . The 2,300 days and the four great kingdoms bring us down to the end, A.D. 1843. All the great events in the history of God's dealing with his people were preceded by special warning. Daniel knew by books just when the captivity of his people would end. So they were to know by books just when the days of the little horn were numbered, when the saints should possess the kingdom. "If you can make a calculation with the prophetical numbers," Father Miller would say, "a calculation based on a true interpretation, that does not show you that 1843 is to see the end of the world, I should like to see that calculation."

'Forty-three went by. We find him in '44 confident that there had been no mistake in his reckoning, and that there was nothing to be discovered that would account for the delay in Christ's coming. He cheered his disciples by his patience with the tarrying vision. They had not taken into account the difference between Roman and Jewish time; he told them 1843 Roman time was 1844 Jewish time. He should be happy, he wrote, if he was as sure of heaven as he was of the truth of the prophecies of Daniel.

It was in the summer of 1844 he called attention to the focalization of the prophetic numbers upon the tenth day of the seventh month of that current Jewish year, which corresponded with the year of Jubilee. The tenth day of the seventh month was that of the great day of the Atonement. Might they not believe that the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and forty-four was the year of the world's Jubilee—the great and final atonement? The well-worn Bibles of his followers were studied with increased interest. Dark passages found wondrous illumination in the light of the new gospel. The few that opposed the theory were silenced by an avalanche of prophetical exposition, showing that the "tenth day of the seventh month, year of Jubilee—and probably at the hour of even—would see the Lord himself coming in the clouds of heaven." The exact time had not been fixed upon without vexatious difficulty. There was the matter of a difference between the time the Rabbinical Jews kept the Passover and that of the Caraite Jews, which must be considered in deciding upon so momentous a date. "If the Caraite Jews always observed the Passover at the second full moon after the vernal equinox, we might always know where their year began. But when the barley is ripe they observe with the Rabbinical Jews at the first full moon. The first full moon after the equinox varies from the 20th of March to the 5th of April. When it comes near the 20th of March the barley is not ripe, and the Caraites observe the 2d. But when it comes near the 1st of April the barley is frequently ripe, and then the Caraites and Rabbinical Jews observe the Passover at the same full moon. This year, the first full moon came on the 3d of April, and whether the barley was then ripe and the true Passover then kept, or whether it was not observed till the following moon, we hav no certain means of knowing. As the first full moon came so late this year, it is probable the Caraites then observed the Passover, unless the harvest was more than usually late. If so, it follows that we shall soon be in the seventh month. . . ."

Many were the struggling offshoots of the fanaticism when that October went by, and all things continued as they were. Strange leaders arose in the camp of the disappointed, men and women claiming supernatural gifts and authority in scriptural interpretation not to be lightly set aside. But the majority of the fifty thousand and more of believers in William Miller's gospel did not forsake their leader nor giv up their faith in the speedy appearing. At the call of Father Miller this remnant, sifted of the weak and wavering, assembled in conference at Albany, April 25, 1845, when a declaration of faith was agreed upon and the name "Adventist" adopted—the birth of another organized sect in Christendom, numbering to-day many thousands.

Father Miller never lost the love and veneration of his followers. "There was no mistake in the prophecies," he maintained; chronology was at fault. He was gathered to his fathers on December 20, 1849, aged sixty-eight years. Upon his monument in the graveyard at Low Hampton is inscribed:

But go thy way till the end be, for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days.

Who shall say that Father Miller contributed nothing to the better understanding of scripture? He was the martyr of mistake—of false teaching. His doctrins in the abstract were based upon the principles of orthodox Protestantism—the right of private judgment in the interpretation of scripture.—Jane Marsh Parker in the Post.

Obituary.

DIED.—At Patch Grove, Wis., July 22d, William Humphrey, in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It has become my sad duty to announce to you that another of your constant readers has "gone to that bourne from which no traveler returns." In other words, my husband, William Humphrey, departed this life on the morning of July 22d. Mr. Humphrey was a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER until his strength failed; then he required some member of the family to read it to him to the very last number that was received previous to his death. His fear was that you would not sufficiently condemn the Anarchists in their nefarious conduct. He greatly feared that the cause of liberty would suffer at their hands if the friends of liberty and progress were not emphatic in their condemnation of their hellish work and words. He attended the Liberal Congress when it was held in Cincinnati, and ever since then he has feared that the cause would be injured by the hotheads styled Socialists, more correctly Anarchists. Mr. Humphrey was a subscriber to the Boston Investigator for more than twenty years, when he said he had outgrown it, as he had been so long settled in his mind in reference to all Bibles and religions, and had become a confirmed Spiritualist. I continued the subscription to the Investigator five years longer for the good it had done for us and others, and when I subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER, simply because I loved to see fair play, he objected and said he wished me to take, instead, some Spiritual paper, as Spiritualism, he said, was a live subject, and he didn't wish me to spend time and money in contemplation of an old effete subject like Christianity or its Bibles, as these subjects were worn threadbare for both of us, which I well knew was true enough, but yet I continued to take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and its free platform, and Mr. Bennett's evident truthfulness and patriotism, won him so that until the day of his death he was a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He read it all, and he very much admired some of its contributors, and enjoyed the "Letters from Friends."

No man, be he who he may, ever left this life to whom these words were more applicable:

He so lived, that when the summons came
To join the innumerable caravan
That moves to the pale realms of shade,
He went not like the quarry slave at night,
scourged to his dungeon;
But, sustained and soothed by an unfaltering trust, Approached his grave like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him,
And lies down to pleasant dreams.

And truly the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism divests Death of his grim terrors, and life of its coldness and hollow vanities.

MARY T. B. HUMPHREY.

"HAV you heard that card-playing has almost ceased in Brooklyn?" asked the Snake Editor. "No, I havn't," replied the Horse Editor; "what is the reason?" "One of the churches decided it wasn't wicked."

SHE: "James, do you know you put three buttons on the plate in church to-day?" He: "Yes, I knew what I was about." She: "James, perhaps you don't know that I bought those buttons yesterday for my new dress, and paid fifty cents apiece for them." He: "Alas! What hav I done?"

IT is said that the Rev. Sam Small owes certain small sums of money, which he is in no haste to pay. When a man becomes so thoroughly imbued and saturated with religion as Sam is supposed to be, he would rather owe money all his life than cheat anybody out of it.

A SOVEREIGN prince on his travels, when passing through a village, expressed to the nativ magistrate his astonishment at seeing so many of the children running about with bare feet. "Ach, your highness," replied the worthy official, "that is the way with the children hereabouts; they are all born so."

OLD gentleman (to boy): "Do you go to Sunday-school, little boy?" Little boy: "Nop." Old gentleman: "You shouldn't say nop. Nor church?" Little boy: "Nop." Old gentleman: "Bless me! Aren't your parents Christian people?" Little boy: "Yep. But you see one's a Catholic and the other's a Protestant. That lets me out."

A MAIDEN of Boston,
One morning while tossed on
The waves of the surf at Long Branch,
Set up a wild squealing,
With such piercing feeling,
That every face near her did blanch!

She kicked and gyrated,
In a way animated,
While her face wore expression of woe,
Till when rescued she stated,
In voice with fear freighted,
That a lobster shook hands with her toe.

THE small boy, with complacent mien,
At twilight eats the apple green;
The doctor pours at midnight dim
Jamacia ginger into him.
He vows, while in the colic's power,
No more green apples he'll devour.
Next day, recovered from his pain,
He hankers for the fruit again.

"WHY should New Yorkers get up a testimonial to Mr. Gladstone?" asks a correspondent. Because Mr. Gladstone has labored to establish Home Rule in Ireland. Because Home Rule in Ireland will doubtless cause the Irish to desert our shores and return to their nativ heath. Because New York may stand a chance of getting a little Home Rule for themselvs in the above desirable event. That's why.—Life.

A YOUNG man was to speak in response to the toast, "The Ladies." He got the lines of Pope on vice mixed with these of Scott on woman, and delivered himself as follows: "I rise to say that I hav no doubt but I voice the sentiment of every gentlemen here when I say in the familiar lines:

"'O woman, in our hours of ease,
Uncertain, coy, and hard to please;
But when too oft familiar with thy face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.'"

Paine Vindicated!

—o—

A thorough and overwhelming reply to the New York Observer's slanderous attacks upon the Author-Hero of the American Revolution. Containing both the slanders and their refutation.

BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

—o—

The New York Observer (Presbyterian) having recently reissued its assault upon the memory of Paine, this pamphlet should be circulated everywhere in vindication.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC CANARD

A Fabricated Account of a Scene at the Death-bed of Thomas Paine.

BY W. H. BURR.

This pamphlet shows that the account of Paine's dying moments attributed to Bishop Fenwick (upon which the Observer relies to prove its principal charges) is a forgery, it being impossible that Fenwick could hav written the alleged account.

18pp. Price 5 cents; 25 for $1.00.

A BEING of infinit wisdom has no right to create a person destined to everlasting pain. For the honest Infidel, according to the American evangelical pulpit, there is no heaven. For the upright Atheist, there is nothing in another world but punishment. Judge Black admits that lunatics and idiots are in no danger of hell. This being so, his God should hav created only lunatics and idiots. Why should the fatal gift of brains be given to any human being if such gift renders him liable to eternal hell? Better be a lunatic here and an angel there. Better be an idiot in this world if you can be a seraph in the next.—Ingersoll.

A MOTHER should desire to giv her children a superabundance of enthusiasm, to the end that, after they hav lost all they are sure to lose by mixing with the world, enough may still remain to prompt and support them through good actions. A cloak should be of three-pile to keep its gloss in wear.—Hare's Guesses at Truth.

THERE is no great merit in taking care of one's own interests, whether it be in this world or the next. The man who leads a truly religious life in order to go to heaven is not more to be admired than the man who leads a regular and industrious life in order to make a fortune; and the man who endeavors to secure a celestial inheritance by going to church and by reading chapters in the Bible, and by having family prayers, and by saying grace in falsetto, with his eyes hypocritically closed, is not above the level of those who fawn and flatter at oriental courts in order to obtain a monopoly or an appointment.—Winwood Reade.

A CONGREGATIONAL minister, defending himself from the charge of insincerity, replied to a liberal correspondent: "I do, without any concealment, declare that I do not believe the whole Bible to be true; that there are human additions and interpolations; that, in fact, Prof. Robertson Smith is right in the view he has taken. Must I say all I think to the weak and stupid public—for such it is? I never say anything I don't believe. I only act on Christ's own principle, 'I hav many things to say unto you, but you cannot bear them now.' Yes, God is afraid of upsetting weak minds, if Christ echoed the divine view of things in that statement." We giv this extract without by any means approving all that it implies.—Index.

IF I were to pray for a taste which should stand me in stead under every variety of circumstances, and be a source of happiness and cheerfulness to me through life, and a shield against its ills, however things might go amiss and the world frown upon me, it would be a taste for reading. Giv a man this taste and the means of gratifying it and you can hardly fail of making a happy man, unless, indeed, you put into his hands a most pernicious selection of books. You place him in contact with the best society in every period of history—with the wisest, the wittiest—with the tenderest, the bravest, and the purest characters that hav adorned humanity.—Sir John Herschel.

THERE is not to be found, in all history, any miracle (1) attested by such a number of men of such unquestioned good sense, education, and learning as to secure us against all delusion in themselvs; (2) of such undoubted integrity as to place them beyond all suspicion of any design to deceive others; (3) of such credit and reputation in the eyes of mankind as to hav a great deal to lose in case of their being detected in any falsehood; (4) and, at the same time, attesting facts performed in such a public manner and in so celebrated a part of the world as to render the detection unavoidable; all which circumstances are requisit to giv us a full assurance in the testimony of men.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

A WRITER from Paris says that in that city every Catholic priest is a watched man, and significantly adds, "Hence there is a great moral reformation going on."

THE Rev. Sam Jones says: "The reason why the Baptists are so fond of cold water is because they know they are all going to a place where there is not a drop to be had."

CHILDREN playing in the bed of Silver Creek, in the midst of the city of Silverton, Ore., found a piece of gold-bearing rock, rich in the precious metal, and now there is a gold craze among the inhabitants of the little city.

THE shah of Persia has joined the Prohibitionists and closed all the cafes in the kingdom. The women of Persia had grown tired of spending their evenings alone and requested his oriental sublimity to interfere, and the domestic equilibrium is again restored.

AT the October term of the City Court of Brooklyn it is believed that the action for divorce of Mrs. Staunton against her husband, the Rev. Benjamin Staunton, pastor of the Fort Greene Presbyterian church, will be brought to trial. The accused pastor has just had his answer delivered to his wife's counsel. Mrs. Staunton charged her husband with serious offenses. Staunton is charged with undue familiarity with Mrs. Mary Laidlaw, a member of his church choir. In his answer, which covers twelve pages of legal cap, these charges are denied. He claims to hav only treated Mrs. Laidlaw as he "would any other member of his congregation." Until it is ascertained how the rest of the congregation fared, the Rev. Mr. Staunton's defense will hav to be set down as somewhat ambiguous.

A ST. PAUL clergyman is reported as saying that if Jesus Christ "ran a carpenter shop here in this city fully one-half of our church-members, who drive up to our churches in their fine carriages, would not speak to him. He could not get social recognition unless he lived on Summit avenue or belonged to a club."

MARY S. MARTIN, of Philadelphia, a member of the Society of Friends, saw William C. Eisenhower beating his horse. She remonstrated, and he swore at her. She had him arrested, and the justice looked over the statutes until he found an old law against swearing, and he then imposed the fine provided therefor. The fine was sixty-seven and a half cents.

A CHINAMAN, who has been in the New Westminister, Canada, jail, under sentence of death, was very angry when told a few days ago that he was reprieved for a month. He said that after death his soul would inhabit the body of a bird, and he was anxious for the transmigration to take place, that he might peck out the eyes of those who had testified against him.

THE disposition of the thrifty temperance farmers of Iowa, as noted by the World's correspondent, to be willing to sell their corn to local distilleries, provided the whisky is sold outside the state, reminds one of the virtue of the woman who "experienced religion" at a revival. "Finding that my jewelry was dragging me down to hell," she remarked, "I took it off and gave it to my sister."

H. G. RUSH, of New Danville, Pa., has published what he considers a startling astronomical theory, that upsets all of Kepler's laws and the old doctrin that heavenly bodies move in ellipses, parabolas, and hyperbolas. He proposes to show that the form of all orbits is circular, and that the central force may occupy any position in the orbit from center to circumference, the circumference only being excluded.

THE Roman Catholic bishop of Kilkenny declares that the penalty of excommunication will be visited upon all Catholics marrying Protestants, and upon the witnesses to such marriages as well. Furthermore, notice of the marriage will be read from the altar of the church which the Catholic party attends for three consecutiv Sundays, and thus "the crime of the offending party be brought into light before his or her fellow-parishioners."

THE Superior court at Taunton, Mass., has just found John M. Driscoll, of Fall River, guilty of keeping open shop on the Lord's Day. Driscoll is a barber, and on a Sunday in July the city marshal found him shaving a customer in his shop. That constituted keeping open shop. The judge in his charge said it is a provision of the law that whoever keeps open his shop, warehouse, or workhouse on the Lord's Day shall be punished. So the jury brought in a verdict of guilty, and the case will now be taken to the Supreme court.

THE Canadian and Michigan conference of the African Methodist Episcopal church, recently in session at Grand Rapids, rolled up its sleeves one day and bounced the Rev. George Solomon for alleged slothfulness; the Rev. A. Wilson for alleged indolence and creating dissensions among his people; the Rev. S. T. Whiting for alleged failure to settle his accounts with the conference and sowing discord; Deacon Chandler for alleged lying and doing the discord act. Had the conference not grown tired it is thought that there would now be no negro preachers in the church.

AN Italian paper contains the following information with regard to the state of the pope's health. "It is perfectly true," it says, "that the other night the pope had an intestinal disturbance which alarmed the Vatican. But it was not an unforeseen case. The pope had suffered for more than two years from intestinal inflammation, and the most eminent physicians were consulted in vain. The other evening the pope had gone to bed earlier than usual, after having drunk some warm beverage. He was rather fatigued and in pain. The doctor had visited him during the afternoon. At about 12:30 o'clock at night the cardinals in the antechamber, and the valet who was watching, were aroused by a loud ringing of the bell. They ran, and found the pope suffering from excruciating pains. The doctor was immediately sent for, and in a moment the whole Vatican was aroused. The severe pains lasted till 5 A.M., at which time the pope fell asleep for a short time, but at 6 o'clock he determined to get up at all costs. For the next two days he received no one but his familiar friends and servants, who were deeply impressed by the extreme pallor of his countenance." At the next election the cardinals should see to it that they run a healthy man into office—one who will not be continually alarming the Vatican with "intestinal disturbances."

The Church and Its Influence.

Christianity was first under the power of the government, but in time it bent the government to all its purposes, and finally subverted it. Christians little think what they are doing when they attempt to defend the Christianity of the present day. Millionaire Christians and aristocratic churches are no more in keeping with the teachings of Jesus than the acts of the czar of Russia are in keeping with the Declaration of Independence.

The pagan party was the most intellectual. It asserted that human knowledge could only be obtained by reason, study, and observation. The other party maintained that the written revelation of God was ample to furnish man with all the knowledge it was necessary for him to obtain. The baleful effects of such teaching upon the destinies of the world can never be computed.

A belief that the Bible is the word of God, and will impart all the knowledge requisit for man to possess, has had a tendency to check human progress all through the Christian centuries.

It is such belief which has caused the ministry to be overrated both mentally and morally.

It was the teaching of such doctrin which caused the beautiful Hypatia, who taught mathematics and philosophy to the wealthy and cultured classes of Alexandria, to be murdered by a Christian mob and cut in pieces, the flesh scraped from the bones and the fragments burnt. For centuries the fate of this grand woman was held up as a warning to all who should dare to promulgate ideas of their own. The great library at Alexandria was burnt and the chain which linked us with ancient science and literature was severed. From this time on everyone must think as ordered by ecclesiastics.

In proof of what I say I quote from a decree promulgated by Theodosius, in the fourth century: "We decree, therefore, that all the writings which Porphyry or anyone else hath written against the Christian religion, in possession of whomsoever they may be found, shall be committed to the fire." And he gives this as a reason for the decree: "For we would not suffer any of those things so much as to come to men's ears which tend to provoke God to wrath, and to offend the minds of the pious."

And to show how free the people were to think for themselves, and how easy it was to cram the dogmas of the church down the throats of the people, I will quote next another decree of the same emperor in regard to the belief of the holy trinity. Those who objected to the doctrin of the trinity were not only to suffer the condemnation of divine justice, but the severest penalty which our authority, guided by heavenly wisdom, may think proper to inflict."

In the year 529 Justinian ordered all the schools in philosophy to be closed. To affirm that death was in the world before the fall of man was made a state crime. Thus it will be seen how reason was hamstrung by the decrees of Christians in power. Before Adam ate the apple the strongest man could not hav killed him with a cleaver. A cannon ball fired against him would hav got the worst of it. Dynamite would hav sniled off the other way. Strychnine would hav proved as innocuous as a drop of heaven's dew. In short, if Adam had not eaten the apple he would hav been among us to-day hale and hearty, and Mrs. Adam would hav been as rosy a lass as ever fired the muse of Burns. They could not hav been killed if they had been chopped up into mincemeat or roasted in a furnace. That fatal apple is all that hindered our first parents from being amongst us to-day without the frosts of age, decrepitude, or wrinkle. Believe or be damned."

I wish Adam had been in "Sheol" before he got a bite of it. What a volume of history he would hav been able to write, and how many differences between historians he might hav settled! Such was the nonsensical drivel crammed down the throats of the people and backed by the severest penalties, for centuries, till the people into fools and the other half into lying hypocrits.

History, geography, astronomy, in short, every branch of human knowledge, was made to square with and conform to this nightmare of Christian superstition. To show the spirit of the times and the wonderful knowledge which the Christian religion was capable of imparting, I will quote from St. Augustine, acknowledged to be one of the most learned fathers of the fourth century: "I now beheld the father who made these things—the son in whom he made these things—and believing as I did, my God as the trinity, I searched farther in his holy word, and lo, thy spirit moved upon the waters! Behold the trinity! Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, creator of all creation! Wondrous depths of thy words. It is awful to look therein. The enemies thereof I hate vehemently. Oh, that thou wouldst slay them with thy two-edged sword."

The language and the ideas would seem to convey the impression that this pious old stickleback was filled with the holy ghost. Very few men had more to do in molding the character of the church than this Christian fungus.

Better for the world if such bigots and tyrants had never lived. Such are the characters of the promulgators of the Christian religion. Even to-day we are not free from their influence. In magazines, histories, and encyclopedias, theological matters are referred to and written up by theologians, and are to be taken with a grain of allowance. They never write anything contrary to the faith which they preach. A belief in the Bible as the divine word of God has been productiv of untold evils to the human race. A divine revelation admits of no change—no improvement. All new discoveries are a blasphemous prying into things which God would hav revealed to us if it had been for our good.

God is a great giant with all the ignorance and brutality which characterized man when he was fashioned. He made a flat earth because his creators believed the earth to be flat. He made it in six days out of nothing, with all the trees and plants and animals pertaining thereto. The planets, stars, and sun were simply appendages to his flat earth, because man had not risen above such crude notions. Above the flat earth was heaven, below was a fiery hell where those who do not believe such holy nonsense can be eternally roasted. Man was made out of dust, and then God chloroformed him and took out a rib and made a woman, and that is the reason she is such a soother. And then a snake treated them to an apple and they were condemned to labor and to death. One absurdity after another. If God inspired somebody to write these foolish lies, then the author of Baron Munchausen ought to be deified. Such balderdash is a disgrace to human intelligence, much more to a God. Such was the profound learning of the men who wrote the Bible and fashioned its God. And to establish a belief in this divine wickumtweedle and oppose every improvement and fight every reform has been the work of the church.

In proof of what I say I will call another witness to the stand—one of the fathers of the church of the fourth century—Lactantius. He was so learned as to receive the appellation of the Christian Cicero. He is going to tell what he knows about the rotundity of the earth. Listen: "Is it possible that men can be so absurd as to believe that the grass and the trees on the other side of the earth hang downward, and that men hav their feet higher than their heads? How could men on the other side of the globe see the Lord ascending in the air?"

This was very pious, if not very scientific. If this sets forth the learning of one who was noted for his erudition, what must hav been the condition of the masses? He knew nothing about the rotundity of this earth, or systems and universes, and cared less. Like other Christians of his day, it was enough for him to know "Christ and him crucified."

Every rational thought was held as blasphemous. At the command of such pious cranks ancient philosophy and art and literature were suppressed, and for nearly two thousand years these holy imbecils hav fought every new discovery, and hav thrown their solid force against every improvement. Draper says: "Since the party that had become dominant in the empire could not furnish works capable of competing with the great pagan authors, there arose a political necessity for the discouragement and the persecution of profane learning. The profession of philosophy had become dangerous, and it was made a state crime. In its stead there arose a passion for the marvelous—a spirit of superstition. Egypt exchanged her great men, who had made her museum immortal, for bands of solitary monks and sequestered virgins, with which she was overrun." And farther, that "Christianity had modified paganism, and paganism had modified Christianity," and that "no insignificant portion of the vast revenues found their way into the church. Men who, under the mask of zeal for the predominant faith, sought only the enjoyment of its emoluments."

Christian zeal and the love of filthy lucre form a strange compound, but the one is sure to be accompanied by the other. Sam Jones and Talmage keep whacking away at the world's greed, but always keep an eye on their salaries.

The church has always opposed scientific investigation. The size of the earth was quite accurately ascertained three hundred years before the Christian era. Why was not the fact generally promulgated among Christians? If any new theory was brought out, especially in regard to astronomy, it was referred to the church fathers, without any regard to facts, and there investigation ceased. Draper declares that "so great was the preference of sacred over profane learning that Christianity did not produce a single astronomer for fifteen hundred years."

Is it surprising that Bruno was burnt, that Galileo was persecuted, that the most important scientific records and books were destroyed by the church? What was science compared with the interests of the church? What was human life worth when a thinker struck at the infallibility of the church and the holy fathers? Many of the murders and tortures of the Inquisition were inflicted to suppress thought, or to get thinkers out of the way entirely.

Long and hard did the church struggle to retain its flat earth. The thought of a revolving world threw the church into a fit of hysterics. Heaven was up, hell was down; where would heaven and hell be if the earth revolved upon an axis? One starting off in the right direction for heaven might land in hell. When Gabriel blows his trump, how can those hear who are on the opposit side of the earth? How can those on the opposit side of the earth "see the Lord in the air?" We hav always pointed "up" to heaven; if the earth revolves on an axis, how shall we know whether we are pointing to heaven or hell? If the earth revolves, how did Joshua stop the sun and moon in their courses? For hundreds of years the church opposed such arguments as these against astronomical science.

The solar theory was quite well understood centuries before the dawn of the Christian era; the sun in the center, the planets—Mercury, Venus, Earth, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn—revolving around him, and each supposed to rotate around an axis.

Under this theory, the difficulty of the inconceivable velocity of the sun and fixed stars in revolving around the earth every twenty-four hours at once vanished. Astronomers, perceiving that the annual motion of the earth did not appear to affect the positions of the fixed stars, drew very rational conclusions in regard to their great distances from the earth. These matters were understood by a few, and discussed in a secret way, but the theory was met by the church and choked down by objections as narrated.

The fathers had dabbled in holy water until they were incapable of rising to a comprehension of a system of worlds. Some of these same objections against the solar theory were urged by the Inquisition when Galileo was summoned before that august body.

It is not hard to understand why science went limping and slipshod. Science is ever exploring new fields, ever making new discoveries, ever advancing. But how does this comport with the idea, which the church had fairly soaked into the heads of its dupes, that God had revealed to them all that it was good for them to know. The more the people could be kept in ignorance, the greater the power which ecclesiastics could wield, and the greater the amount of money which would flow into their coffers. Whichever way science turned its piercing eye, its vision was bounded by the power of the church, whose cardinal doctrin was that a perfect God had put into the hands of infallible men a universal guide-book, which contained the ultimatum of all that man should know—that it was far better to hav ignorance and chains and rags here than eternal hell-fire hereafter. The doctrin of infallibility, either of books or men, will one day be pushed to the wall.

Even now it is doubtful if the church has the power to drive science from the field. And the attempt to harmonize this heavenly guide-book with science is as silly as to attempt to make a lioness suckle a young lamb.

The project of Columbus met with deadly opposition from the church. Its heretical tendencies were pointed out and condemned by the Council of Salamanca. The writings of the holy fathers were quoted against it. The gospels, the psalms, and the prophecies were brought in requisition to show what an unholy undertaking it was.

If the church had not been thwarted in its designs we should be living on a flat earth to-day, and, for aught we know, the wild Indians would hav remained the sole occupants of this glorious land of America.

On the seventh day of September, 1522, the San Vittoria anchored near Seville, after a voyage of more than three years, having circumnavigated the globe. This was the beginning of the end. A thousand times had the church pronounced upon a flat earth; as many times had it asserted its infallibility; but now the spinal cord of the arrogant old hag was paralyzed. No longer could she stand erect; henceforth she was doomed to crawl; the dogma of infallibility had turned to ashes.

The lie which she had so often told in the face of the world had been hurled back into her teeth. All the scripture which she had quoted to prove a flat earth showed that God had made a mistake. Even the story of old Joshua, the great planetary thimble-rigger, had ended in smoke.

Priests might rave, popes might howl, but the flat earth was gone. God's word had been impeached. Science had plugged up one hole in the ecclesiastical skimmer. There was no way to cover up the big lie which the church had been telling in the face of all the world, for a vessel had actually started west, under the command of one Magellan, and continued to sail in a westerly course, and had arrived home from the east. The most strenuous efforts of the church can no longer make the key of science fit the old ecclesiastical lock. St. Peter is sick; shut the door; close the blinds; the church is going to change its shirt.

It would seem that writers hav not given due weight to the importance of this event. That single voyage did more to break the spinal column of the church than any other one event. A mistake of an infallible God, or Bible, or church, strikes a fatal blow at the pretense. The church could no longer face the world and say that she had made no mistake. She never recovered from the shock of that fatal voyage. From the day that the San Vittoria dropped her anchor on her return from that memorable voyage the power and prestige of the church began to wane.

Before the voyage of Magellan the Bible was quoted to prove a flat earth. Now the attempt is made to harmonize the scriptures with a globular earth.

Has the Bible changed, or are a flat and round earth identical? Some Christian Moses ought to be able to lead us out of the wilderness of this dilemma. So in the beginning of the temperance agitation the Bible and the bottle were boon companions—the one was quoted in favor of the other, and many times the minister carried both. Now the Bible is all on the side of temperance.

So in the early days of the antislavery movement the Bible was all on the side of slavery. Now there is nothing in it to uphold the institution. So in the time of the last war "the God of battles" was particularly on "our side," and to hear ministers quote scripture in their war sermons one would think that they had received a special telegram from "headquarters" to let them know on which side of Mason and Dixon's line the Christian God roosted. Down in "Dixie" he was on the other side.
